PRETENSE AND PRACTICE; OR, HOW THE CHURCH HYPOCRITS LOVE THE POOR.

Notes and Clippings.

HERBERT SPENCER, writing to Dr. Janes of the Brooklyn Ethical Society, observes: "In my earlier days I constantly made the foolish supposition that conclusiv proofs would change beliefs. But experience has long since dissipated my faith in men's rationality."

THERE has been a movement among the Odessa, Russia, newspapers to stop issuing Monday editions, in order to giv their printers a holiday on Sunday; but the editors and publishers could not arrive at an understanding on this subject, and the matter was dropped.

A TURKISH official says that the Levantine Turks hav for many years been becoming more and more fanatical: "At the end of the Crimean war ten per cent of the Turks were religious fanatics; at the death of Abdul Aziz, fifty per cent; to-day there are ninety per cent."—Sun.

THE labor bill debated for the past fortnight in the Spanish senate, framed in accordance with the ideas of the Roman Catholic bishops, members of the senate, provides that all contracts for labor must be understood to contain prohibition of work not only on Sundays, but on feast days. This means about ninety holy days a year. Fines will be inflicted on employers and employed for infringing this law, and the ecclesiastical authorities will hav the right to enforce all its provisions against Catholics.

MRS. ANNIE BESANT announces that she will devote her life to Theosophy. In a letter declining candidacy at the school board election, she says: "The death of my honored friend and chief, Mme. Blavatsky, throws on me heavy additional work in connection with the Theosophical movement, and, believing as I do, that in the progress of that movement lies the hope of better religious, moral, and social order than we hav to-day, I elect to leave the more popular work in other hands and devote myself wholly to the less attractiv duty of pressing the claims of a spiritual philosophy on a public largely dominated by materialism."

THE German kaiser has offended by selecting Sunday on which to visit the naval exhibition during his coming visit to England. The Workingmen's Lord's Day Rest Association, one of the very numerous societies which undertake to look after the piety of Englishmen, has been particularly shocked at the young emperor's impiety. It has caused questions to be asked in Parliament. Many signatures hav been obtained to a formal protest to be sent to the exhibition council, and there is talk of petitioning Queen Victoria to exercise her grandmotherly influence in the matter. The members of the Lord's Day Rest Association are evidently not aware, says the New York Sun, that the executiv council of the naval exhibition hav broken the Sabbath every week since the show was opened by giving select garden parties in the grounds, and in other profane ways entertaining their friends.

IN response to a Herald inquiry as to means for the perfection of the human race, Prof. Jos. Jastrow, of the University of Michigan, says that of the most desirable qualities he "would single out as most representativ mental pliability, a freedom from subserviency to inherited and outgrown notions and beliefs, the power to originate and adapt oneself to the newly originated, to be not 'dumb, driven cattle,' but the 'heroes in the strife.' When we consider the enormous obstructions that hav been placed in the way of so many invaluable intellectual and ethical reforms and reformers we realize how different might hav been the pages of history had mental pliability, with its ethical counterpart, tolerance, held sway over the masses. The lower races are distinguished from the higher by a more rapidly completed development as well as by an earlier waning of the powers, the period of preparation, of adaptability to the environment, being limited. With this goes a more rigid conservatism, perhaps an unreasoned mental tenacity, if not obstinacy. How little does our commonly used term, 'open to conviction,' really represent."

THERE has been received in Rome a memorial addressed to the cardinals, endeavoring to enlist their aid in the scheme of colonizing European priests in the United States. It asserts that the European governments must exert themselvs to retain their influence over their emigrants to the United States. The memorial is very lengthy, making over four thousand words. It traces the loss of faith by emigrants to: 1. The danger to which their morals are exposed during the journey. 2. The lack of national priests to receive and care for the emigrants on arrival in the United States. 3. The pecuniary sacrifices exacted of them in the United States for the practice of their religion. 4. The public schools. 5. Secret societies; and 6. The lack of national bishops. The political character of the movement is inadvertently manifested by the statement that the European governments can no longer regard the matter with indifference and that it is of the utmost importance to them to retain their influence over their people in America. It insists, for this purpose, on the preservation of their national language and the formation of national societies among emigrants in the United States.

AN account of the late fight between Greek Orthodox and Roman Catholic priests at Bethlehem, reads thus: "On the other side of the manger ten Franciscan monks had taken up their position, and during the ceremony had behaved in such a manner as greatly to vex the Orthodox worshipers. As the archbishop was about to return to the church, the deacon carrying the host, in walking round the manger, placed his foot on the ground which the Franciscans consider as belonging to them. One of them sprang at the deacon, and struck him on the head with a stick which he carried under his mantle so that the Greek reeled backward. The archbishop immediately advanced. The Franciscans beat the deacons, who hurried up to protect the prelate, unmercifully, and then withdrew. The three Greeks who were wounded were sent to Jerusalem, to the Orthodox Hospital of the Holy Sepulcher. Upon request of the chief of police, who was at once sent to Bethlehem, the Turkish governor sent thither a company of soldiers. Half of them took up their position at the manger, and so divided the Greeks from the Catholics, while the rest patroled the Christian quarters."

Christianity and Evolution.

SCRAPS OF EVIDENCE.

Regarding, as he evidently did, any mention of Jesus either by the early fathers or by historians between the first and fourth centuries A D. as important links in the chain of evidence, Dr. Paley adduces some slight scraps of evidence from such sources as Clement, Hermas, Polycarp, Ignatius, and a circular letter of the church of Smyrna, which is put in in support of the assertion relating to the alleged sufferings of the eye-witnesses.

Of Hermas we are told that a work called the "Shepherd" (Lardner, Cred., vol. i, p. 111) by this writer is still remaining. "Its antiquity," says Paley, "is incontestable from the quotations of it in Irenæus A D 178; Clement of Alexandria, A D. 194; Tertullian, A D 200; Origen, A D 200. The notes of the times extant in the epistle itself agree with its title and with the testimonies concerning it, for it purports to hav been written during the lifetime of Clement." Paley claims that this piece contains "tacit allusions" to three of the gospels, and similar expressions to those of the sacred books. Ignatius is claimed to hav written some epistles, which are referred to by Polycarp his contemporary and quoted by Irenæus A.D. 178 and by Origen A.D. 230.

Of Polycarp Paley claims: 1. That he had conversed with many who had seen Christ. 2. That he was appointed by the apostles bishop of Smyrna. 3. That we hav one of his epistles undoubtedly remaining.

Now, the same objection we hav urged against the previous alleged evidence applies to this, only in a stronger degree. It is not pretended that any of these writers knew Jesus, and any assertion that they knew people who knew Jesus must be regarded as doubtful, since we hav not the declarations of those who allege that they knew Jesus to judge from. But when we come to value such evidence as these writings afford we find them tainted through and through; for they not only contain these statements, but relate such extraordinary occurrences as to be quite beyond the reach of credibility. For instance, in one of them we are told not only that St. Paul's head was cut off, but the worthy bishop of Rome, Louis, his contemporary, tells us how "instead of blood naught but a stream of pure milk flowed from his veins;" and further we are instructed that his severed head took three jumps "in honor of the trinity, and at each spot on which it jumped there instantly struck up a spring of living water, which retains at this day a plain and distinct taste of milk" (Diegesis, p. 256, 257). One statement like this would destroy the value of a hundred such epistles; but they contain in addition such a mass of puerile and absurd stories of a similar character that no one can trust for a single moment any of their declarations. The truth is, none of these writings can be regarded either as evidence of the reality of Jesus or of the authenticity of the gospels. For all practical purposes, then, the gospels are anonymous productions.

As the learned author of the "Evolution of Christianity" remarks (p. 153), "Evangelical theologians formerly assigned to the versions of these books in our possession an authenticity as indisputable as if our modern editions were printed in heaven and Jesus himself revised the proof-sheets. But the gospels hav not reached us as divine editions. Jesus never wrote nor edited them, nor did he instruct apostles or disciples to compose sacred books the contents of which should be binding on the reason and conscience of posterity. On the contrary, so unsuggestiv of dogma and mysticism was the simple theology of Jesus that the necessity for written records seems never to hav occurred to him. Had he foreseen the future growth of a Christian literature, of authorship so doubtful and interpretations so conflicting as to originate the antagonistic creeds of hostil churches, fruitful in anathemas involving eternal perdition, Jesus would hav placed on record in a few brief words, as intelligible to the multitude as his formula of prayer, the simple articles of faith which, in his opinion, qualify members for the kingdom of heaven."

Now, against Paley's allegation of the persecution of "eye-witnesses" we hav to put the calm and impartial view of historians. Gibbon's view is that the whole number of martyrs of the English church is "somewhat less than two thousand persons;" but, as this careful writer observes, "Christians, in the course of their intestin dissensions, hav inflicted far greater severities on each other than they hav experienced from the zeal of Infidels" (Gibbon's Decline and Fall, pp. 273, 274) But suppose it were true that some of the early Christians were persecuted and put to death, surely that is not a sufficient reason for the assumption that Christianity is therefore true. If persecution of any particular faith is evidence of its truth, all religions are true, for the believers in each in turn hav been subjected to persecution and many hav suffered martyrdom. Heroism under such circumstances does not demonstrate the truth of the believer's faith; it merely demonstrates his earnestness and his enthusiastic fidelity to what he regards as truth. And as most religions hav had their martyrs, it follows that most martyrs hav died to uphold what, after all, was an error or a delusion. It is true that they believed that they were suffering for truth's sake, and therefore it was true to them. But viewing the matter in the calm and clear light which history and the growth of human intelligence throw upon the subject, this reckless desire for martyrdom shows that human beings in the past hav been more ardent in their desire to uphold preconceived notions than in the more worthy desire to investigate and search for truth whithersoever it might lead.

ARTHUR B. MOSS.

Letters to Workingmen.

What is government? Friends, you may think the question superfluous, but take the writings of the various advocates of political and social reform and see how many different answers you will get. You will find in these essays, like the epitaphs we inscribe over the dead, a total disregard of facts, in their endeavor to do what they consider their duty. They hav in mind an ideal, and not what really exists. Hence we find most writers making government synonymous with public opinion, when in reality it is never anything more than a faint echo. Another speaks of it as identical with civilization, when in fact it is an institution that has sprung up in the path of civilization and has always been a hindrance instead of a promoter, a twin evil in this respect with the church. One writer speaks of it as a fact as permanent as the Gulf Stream or Rocky mountains, no more to be ignored or avoided than government by the weather, etc. Of course he can hav no reference to the government I want you to consider. That we are governed by public opinion, by customs and fashions of society, even as by natural laws, I will admit, but what has political government to do with these? Nothing whatever. As an institution it is shaped and influenced, even as the individual is, by these agents of civilization. But to speak of it as synonymous or identical with these agents is simply using a figure of speech entirely devoid of fact. Hence I say the popular idea of government is a superstition. We talk of government as we do of God, to symbolize authority. We are striving

To giv to airy nothing
A local habitation and a name.

Such is theoretic government or sovereign power. The institution of government, that is to say, the legislativ, executiv, and judiciary powers assumed by the men elected or appointed to the various offices, is quite another thing, and when compared with society or civilization it is a very small thing, as a man is small when compared with a nation. Government is often spoken of as the combined wisdom of the community. It is nothing of the kind, but the individual wisdom or ignorance of some man. Professor Sumner says: "It often turns out some obscure clerk, hidden in the recess of a government bureau, into whose power the chance has fallen for the moment to pull one of the stops which control the government machine. . . . a little functionary on whom a big functionary is forced to depend." We talk of government as a representativ body, carrying the idea that these men represent society and its interests, but this is another one of the "conventional lies of civilization." Society and its interests are more nearly represented by men out of office than in. The phase of society represented by the politician is known as the pot-house. If society wants anything done it will be done whether a law is provided or not, and if society wants a thing not done all the laws in its favor will very soon become dead letters on the statute-books. We are told that these men are chosen by the people to represent them in government. Herbert Spencer tells us how the thing works: "The sovereign people is to appoint representativs and so create a government; the government thus created creates rights, and having created those rights confers them on the sovereign people by which it was itself created. Observe what are the applications. Each man exists in two capacities. In his private capacity he is subject to the government; in his public capacity he is one of the sovereign people who appoint the government. That is to say, in his private capacity he is one to whom rights are given; in his public capacity he is one of those who, through their agency, giv the rights." Now, while this is the process proposed whereby "we, the people," govern ourselvs, there are some exceptions to its truth in detail. In the first place, "the sovereign people" do not "appoint representativs and so create a government." These men, as I hav shown in a former letter, owe their appointment to a clique or ring of politicians whose only object is to obtain power to wring from the toiler his hard-earned wages. Place and pay is all the "representativ" desires. When that is secured his services go to the highest bidder. In the next place government does not "create rights," unless we choose to call its edicts rights because it has an army to enforce them, nor does it "confer rights" upon "the sovereign people." All its rights, so called, are conferred upon classes and corporations.

"The sovereign people" hav the right to vote, the right to toil, if they can find employment—or the right to starve. Again, each man, if he be not a politician, does not "exist in two capacities." In public or private he is still the subject of government. But of the politician it may be said that "he is one to whom rights are given," and also "is of those who through their agency giv the rights." We may trace the evolution from the viking and robber-chief, from the absolute monarch, down to the modern democracy, we shall find the spirit of government unchanged: The creation of a person whose will is supreme and the denial of individual rights. As Hobbes says, "He that carrieth this person is called sovereign and hath sovereign power, and every one besides his subjects." And so far as this being is concerned, it matters not if he be created by "the will of the majority," or inherits life from a deceased relativ, or is ushered in by the "sword of conquest." We must come at last to some power which is absolute, to which all the other powers of the state are subject, and which itself is subject to none." Our Fourth of July orator is fond of telling us what powers we possess as one of the "sovereign people." I want you to study the political history of the world. Go back to the days when sovereignty descended from father to son, or came in with wars of conquest. Note well the condition of the people. Now run your finger down the page and note each change in the form of government and see if there is a corresponding change for the better in the condition of the people. True, our condition in many respects is vastly superior to the "good old days of our fathers;" we are enjoying much to-day unknown to even the rich and royal of "ye olden time," but should we in any way thank government for it? I want you to take into consideration all the actions of government and notice the result to the people. Does it tend to improve their condition? I think if you pursue your investigation in an unbiased manner you will discover that that which has improved the condition of the people has been wrought by causes wholly independent of government. The only action of government in relation to these causes has been to delay them by entangling them with red tape, and allowing favored classes to monopolize them. What good has government wrought from the days when robber-chiefs extorted tribute from passing merchants down to the days of reformed tariff? Political economists and governmental reformers hav pointed out many evils attending government, but the former hav more apologies for government to offer than methods of relief; they sugar-coat the pill with the idea of necessity, while the latter would add some new ingredient to the dose in hopes to neutralize the bitter. These evils the economist would excuse, and the politician would reform, form the integral of government and are the result of previous reforms. As I hav endeavored to show, it began with the rich robber, and when the people begin to murmur at the various methods of robbery, political aspirants discover in the people's discontent an opportunity to advance their own interests and at the same time make it appear to subserve public opinion, and so the panacea of reform is introduced, and agitation begins and ends in a great victory for the people, and they go back to their toil contented. And the rich robber and his lawyers gather in the coin as of old, and the worker's lot is unchanged, and murmurs of discontent again arise and again new measures and new politicians come to the front, and the political dust is again agitated and another long struggle in the interest of the dear public begins. A few are beginning to discover that underneath the bluster of braggadocio and the struggle for supremacy there is an undercurrent where the real promoters of the contending hosts meet and mingle and mature their mercenary motivs while time is carrying them back to the starting-point again, and the plaudits of the victors and the imprecations of defeated candidates are alike food for merriment.

Believes Bacon Wrote Shakspere's Works.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Will you kindly grant me space in THE TRUTH SEEKER for a few words touching on supernaturalism? No man living has done more to liberate mankind from superstition and priestcraft than Robert G. Ingersoll. He deserves thanks from even his opponents. But it is possible he may be mistaken in some other matters; as, for instance, when he says in substance that Bacon was not able to write one page of Shakspere—that, by comparison, the former is as a penny candle to the noonday sun.

A few years ago, on looking over a book of "Specimens of English Authors," I noticed that the compiler remarked, in reference to Bacon, that "he seems to hav written with Shakspere's pen." Here is a different opinion.

Until recently no one doubted that Moses wrote all the Pentateuch, that David wrote all the Psalms, and that a Jesus uttered all the words the priests hav put into his mouth. General belief is generally wrong.

There are some resemblances between the mythical Jesus and Shakspere. They were both poor boys. Neither of them received any education to speak of. A glimpse of each is seen when about twelve years of age, followed by an eclipse lasting till he is about thirty. At that age the former astonishes the ignorant multitude by his occult sayings and magical doings; the latter fascinates the world by his wonderful knowledge and poetical genius. At death, however, neither one had in his possession any written evidence of the works attributed to him. According to the record, Jesus wrote only on the sand and Shakspere wrote a very, very simple will.

To accept the popular notion in regard to these two personages, it is necessary to believe in supernaturalism and miracles; and this is why I regret to find the colonel on the wrong side in this case.

A TRUE TALE.

One sloppy evening a gentleman enveloped in a thick ulster was hurrying along a street in the city of Edinburgh, when, as he was passing the corner of Elder street, a woman accosted him.

She laid her hand upon his arm, speaking to him in such a wistful tone that the gruff answer he was about to make died away upon his lips, and he looked steadily at her for a moment.

She was young, almost girlish, with pale, pinched features, on which was legibly written the word "starvation;" sunken eyes now moist with welling tears, and a cough that served as a death-warrant to its possessor.

"My dear woman," began the gentleman, "what makes you adopt this life?"

"Alas, sir," returned the woman, "I must do this or starve."

"Is it possible you cannot find work enough?" queried again the now astonished gentleman.

"Work," replied the woman in a hard tone. "Yes, I get work and do work. But how can I liv on from four to six shillings a week, especially when I hav a sister to keep who is too young to do for herself. I labor all day from daylight to far into the night, yet I cannot make ends meet."

"Why don't you apply to some of those societies who help women in distress?"

"They are only for the destitute, and while I can earn a shilling, sir, they won't help me. Forbye, there are hundreds of women in my situation who hav to eke out their day's wages by street-walking; women who, like me, detest the life but only do it to keep themselvs and others from starvation. We can not avoid it—either this or death. And were it not for my sister, I would giv the coroner a job to-morrow."

Having obtained the woman's address and given her some money, he left her, promising to call upon her in a day or two.

As he walked along he thought it was curious that a woman should be forced to lead such a life in this city of churches. That where societies for the destitute at home and the heathen abroad abound by the dozens; where missionaries tell of the misery "of the poor bla-ack chil-dren of Ham" to weeping congregations every Sunday; where people express their horror should a dumb animal be maltreated, and where a lot of long-haired, sniveling, hypocritical psalm-singers thank God every day that they were not as the Levite but only wait the opportunity to become as the Samaritan, a woman should be driven to prostitution to save herself from dying of hunger.

It was sad! Think of it, capitalists, when you screw your employees down to the starvation-point, that you may be sending a recruit to that vast army of criminals with which society is overrun, or driving a poorer sister to a life of shame. For every life thus destroyed you are responsible. I often wish there were a hell so that those souls whom the greedy capitalist damned to a life of suffering in this world, would array themselvs against him in the next, and thus, by their united evidence, condemn him to the nethermost pit. Even that would not be punishment enough for that wrecker of lives.

A week had passed, yet Mr. Ramsay—the gentleman whom the woman had accosted that sloppy night—had not called on her. Business troubles had well-nigh made him forget his promis, until this evening, as he left his office, he remembered it, and turned his footsteps in the direction of the Canongate.

As he walked along he could hardly repress a tear when he thought of how this woman, if Christianity were true, was surely damning her soul to save her sister's life.

"Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friend," said a teacher of old. Then, was not the love which this magdalen bore to her sister, which not only caused her to lead a miserable life here but also made her forswear eternal felicity in the next world, greater than that devotion which leads a man to lay his life down for his friend? Yes, it is. There is something god-like in a sacrifice like that; something that compels one's admiration!

Reaching Little Jack's Close—a dark, noisome alley—Mr. Ramsay turned down it a little way, when, taking the first stairway to his left, he commenced his ascent.

Gaining the top he knocked at the door and was bade enter. On opening the door he saw, sitting on a chair but looking sicklier than before, the woman he was in search of.

"Good evening, sir," she began, "I thought you had forgotten. Nellie," she called to a little, chubby-faced girl, who was playing with some cotton-spools on the floor, "Nellie, here is the good gentleman I told you of."

Nellie arose slowly, shaking her head so as to get the ends of her sunny curls out of her eyes, and gazed at Mr. Ramsay a moment.

Then, seemingly satisfied with the inspection, she toddled over to where he stood, with a serious look upon her face and with outstretched hand, saying, "'Ow do, thir, 'ow do?"

Mr. Ramsay caught the little sunbeam, as he termed her, up in his arms, and imprinted a kiss upon her chubby cheek.

"This, of course, is your little sister?" began Mr. Ramsay, as he seated himself with Nellie upon his knee.

"Yes, sir," returned the woman.

"Now," continued Mr. Ramsay, "in the first place, tell me all about yourself, that is, as much as you think proper."

In a few words the woman told him her tale. Her name was Jane Thomson. Her parents had died three years ago, leaving her to support herself and sister. She had obtained work from a shirt-store, but the wages were too small for herself and Nellie to liv on. Often had she had to work from daylight until far into the night in order to make ends meet. Many a time had she been tempted to spend her small earnings on drink; for at times she felt so done! Often had she to go without food in order that her sister might eat and liv. But she found that this was undermining her strength, and she dreaded dying, for that would leave her sister helpless.

"And oh, sir, what would become of her?" and the tears flowed from Jane's eyes.

Then it was that one night, when Nellie was crying for bread, and there was none to giv her, the tempter came, and she exchanged her birthright for bread.

"Sooner than see my little darling die of want," sobbed Jane, "I sell my soul to the devil. I know people will say I hav committed an awful sin; but surely God will not be hard upon me, when he remembers it was done to save our lives;" and as the woman leaned back in her chair, somewhat exhausted from speaking, Mr. Ramsay took out his handkerchief and blew his nose until he got red in the face.

"Dear me! dear me! whatever has got into my eye?" he suddenly exclaimed, rubbing that offending organ with his handkerchief; "one cannot be too careful with one's eyes at my time of life, Miss Thomson."

"No, sir," replied Jane, while a faint tinge spread over her pale face and a moistness crept into her eyes as she gazed at him.

"Now, my dear," said Mr. Ramsay, as he stowed away his handkerchief, "I hav an offer for you. I hav found a situation in service for you, and I will offer to take care of Nellie. Will that suit you?"

"Oh, sir," replied Jane, "I thank you very much on behalf of my sister, but as for myself I do not think I shall trouble the world long."

"Why," interrupted Mr. Ramsay, "you are not in such a bad state as that, surely. You look well—" here the woman smiled, for well she knew that that healthy look which sometimes appeared on her face was as the flaring up of the candle-flame ere it expires—"and—" a shade passed over his face as a thought flashed through his brain—"but stay, I will be back in an hour's time," saying which Mr. Ramsay took an unceremonious leave of Jane and hurried down-stairs.

In an hour he had returned with a medical friend and a messenger-boy loaded down with groceries.

Jane, feeling weak, had retired; and now, as she lay upon her bed, one could see the mark of death upon her features.

The doctor looked at her and, shaking his head, said, "She may liv until morning, but that is all; nothing can save her, she is dying."

Jane raised her eyes toward Mr. Ramsay's, saying, "That's nothing. Death is a good friend, one that never cuts you, no matter in what company he finds you!"

"Can you suggest anything, doctor," asked the kind-hearted Mr. Ramsay, "that would alleviate her sufferings?"

"Hav no fear, Ramsay," replied the doctor, "she does not suffer; in fact, death caused by consumption is one of the most painless of any. It is simply a gradual stoppage of the mechanism, owing to the wearing out of the machine."

During the night Mr. Ramsay watched by the bedside of the outcast as fondly as a father over his child.

Toward morning she seemed to rally, but soon fell back into semi-unconsciousness. But as the lengthening shadows of the evening fell upon the courtyard she awoke with a start that shook her whole frame, exclaiming, in broken tones, "It's—com-ing—good-bye—kiss—Nellie——" and, as darkness fell upon this city of churches and poverty, the light went out!

William Robertson.

Christianity in Colleges.

Some years ago Chauncey M. Depew told a graduating class of the Syracuse University that the province of this institution and others like it was to mentally equip men to hold the Christian fort against the devastating pseudo-philosophy of such men as Huxley and Ingersoll. These are not the words he used but they embody the idea he wished to convey. The Christian religion cannot to-day rely on ignorance as much for its support as it could in ages past. Thus the task of ecclesiastical college instruction is, as stated by Mr. Depew, to so bring scientific subjects before the mind of a student that he shall follow sophistical ruts and rivet his mind upon selected details pertaining to general science, so as to lose sight of general principles conflicting with scriptural statements; to still more guard him against skepticism he is obliged to attend chapel daily and church on Sunday, and urged to connect himself with the Young Men's Christian Association, which is strongly intrenched in nearly every university. I hav been acquainted with students about to take their degree in Arts who had never heard of Herbert Spencer, and who had never read one line from the writings of Tyndall or Huxley; who were ignorant that Thomas Paine had anything to do with the independence of this nation, and sincerely believed that all scientific progress emanated from the minds of Christians, chiefly of their own beloved church.

Others of their classmates at heart regarded religion as a form that it would be poor policy to take issue with, and some would rather unwillingly admit their lack of faith if closely questioned. Therefore the Christian college in the field of science is like a fortress in an enemy's country. The field of classics is quite safe; Christian dogma has little to fear in that domain. Abstract mathematics is also safe. Physics is dangerous, the wave theory almost deadly, and to meet this danger substantialism has been invented. Chemistry is quite safe, for the average college student only dabbles in it gently.

Geology will never do at all; but the Christian college deals out a hash under this name, and if any professor gets too fresh and givs the unalloyed fact dead away his goose is cooked forthwith.

A man can wander for twelve weeks through the woods of Washington and get very little knowledge of the state in general. Thus a student may paddle for a term in chemistry, another term in astronomy, and so on, and never get a common-sense idea of either. He has learned many names in a parrot-like way and these will be sufficient when he gets out of college to clear him of the charge of ignorance. Also when we consider the fact that many young men are sent to college simply to be trained to use their wits so as to escape the hardships of manual labor it is not surprising that Christians can point to many of their educated (?) exponents and say: "Behold a lover of the Lord how he prospers." Perhaps he is a Methodist merchant whom Methodists prop up and patronize, and possibly vote into office. Yea! the Lord is with him!

Liberals, in accordance with their means, hav been as benevolent in helping to found colleges and hospitals as Christians hav ever been, and yet where is there a Liberal college or a Liberal hospital? To prove the proposition that it is in part the function of universities to fetter the advance of Freethought, let anyone try, if he will, to find one college in America that will keep The Truth Seeker on file in its reading-room.

No class of people more highly value education than Liberals. Therefore with them lies the possibility, if they would but grasp it, of inaugurating a new and brighter era for themselvs by founding a Liberal university. It is the Liberal-mindedness of Huxley and of Tyndall, of Spencer and of Ingersoll, that has made their names world-wide.

Found a university with the same Liberal-mindedness and its name, too, will soon be world-wide.

Of all the strange games at which men play in the world, I think politics and religion are the two strangest, only we are all so busy with our sticks that we do not find out what we are doing. A man will do anything for his church, and anything for his party, and ask no questions, just because some accident has pitchforked him into his place as a member of one or the other. But whether he is right to be where he finds himself is a question that he never stops to ask.—Fortnightly Review.

Is Avarice Triumphant?

From the Argonaut.

In the June number of the North American Review, Gen. Rush C. Hawkins has written an article entitled "Brutality Triumphant," to which Col. Robert G. Ingersoll has replied. The Hawkins article is pessimistic, of the most forlorn character. The reply by Colonel Ingersoll is the very reverse of this. He says "that many men are guilty of mistaking the afternoon of their own lives for the evening of the world. To them, men are no longer honest or brave, or women virtuous or beautiful. Because they are dyspeptic, it gives them pleasure to think that the art of cooking has been lost." In this class of minds he rates General Hawkins, and, with him, most of the preachers. They lift the hand of warning when the human race takes a step in advance. As wealth increases, they see that all goodness and charity vanish, that all well-dressed and prosperous people lack piety. Lacking patriotism, they malign and slander the land of their birth. They think crime is on the increase; judges are bribed, witnesses are suborned, office-holders are dishonest. Theirs is the mission of Cassandra, and they sit like owls on the limbs of dead trees, hooting at the obsequies of spring, like a modern Marius sitting amid the ruins of all virtues.

Colonel Ingersoll admits that crimes were perpetrated in war expenditures, in the purchase of ships and arms; frauds in careless and extravagant purchases of war material; recklessness in subsidies to railroads and kindred legislation—railroads were built, in anticipation of the war, across the continent, but they hav developed the country through which they passed; defends the "Star Route" trials; excuses the denuding of the public forests for the necessities of early settlers of the Far West; explains the watering of stock; and givs a sensible and rational explanation of what General Hawkins finds it easy to find fault with. General Hawkins picks out individual weaknesses and crimes, and, with a magnifying glass, transforms them all into inexcusable and unpardonable offenses, while Colonel Ingersoll, taking a broader and more generous view, finds much to approve, and concludes that life is worth living and that, since the war, the country has made rapid and healthful progress.

As a sample of the controversy engaged in between these two gentlemen, we giv a summary of the Ingersoll article: General Hawkins asserts that Christianity has neither preached nor practiced humanity to animals, while Sunday-school children are taught what a terrible thing it is to break the Sabbath. Few people (says Ingersoll) will suspect me of going out of the way to take care of the Christian clergy, but I can afford to state the truth. While there is not much in the Bible with regard to practicing humanity toward animals, there is this, at least, "The merciful man is merciful to his beast." Of course I am not alluding to the example set by Jehovah, when he destroyed the cattle of the Egyptians with hailstones and diseases, on account of the sins of their owners. "In the treatment of animals, Christians are much like other people." Lawmakers hav not only protested against cruelty to animals, but hav passed laws to make cruelties a crime, and Henry Bergh, who did as much good as any man who lived in the nineteenth century, was seconded in his efforts not only by the Christian clergy, but by hundreds and thousands and probably millions of professing Christians.

It is true that the Indians hav been badly treated. It is true that the red man has been demoralized by the vices of the white. It is a frightful fact that when a superior race meets an inferior, the inferior race imitates only the vices of the superior, and the superior those of the inferior. They exchange faults and failings. This is one of the most terrible facts in the history of the human race. The breaking of treaties has resulted from the incapacity of the white man to foretell the growth of the republic. The first treaty drove them but a few miles from the Atlantic. A later treaty forced the Indians farther west. In a little while that line was passed and the treaty violated; another treated pushed them farther toward the Pacific, across the Illinois, the Mississippi, the Missouri, till the Pacific ocean was reached.

In 1861, slavery existed. The law defending slavery was imbedded in the federal Constitution. The fugitiv slave law was in full effect. In all the free states it was a crime to giv shelter, food, or raiment to a man or woman seeking liberty by flight. Humanity was illegal, hospitality a misdemeanor, and charity a crime. Men and women were sold like beasts, all the sacred relations of life were trampled beneath the bloody feet of slavery and avarice. So firmly was slavery fixed in law and creed, in statute and scripture, that the tongues of honest men were imprisoned. Those who spoke for the slave were mobbed by the Northern lovers of the Union. These efforts corrupted the politics, demoralized our statesmen, polluted our courts, and poisoned our literature. The Websters, Bentons, and Clays mistook temporary expedience for principles. They believed that the preservation of the Union was the one important thing, and that it could not be preserved unless slavery was protected. They did not suspect that slavery would finally strike the blow for disunion. But when the time came, and the South unsheathed the sword, the teachings of these men, as to the infinit value of the Union, gave to our flag millions of brave defenders.

The republic has been rebuilt and reunited, and we shall remain one people for many centuries to come. The constitution of the United States is the charter of human freedom, and all laws inconsistent with human liberty hav been repealed. There is now freedom of speech. Lips are no longer sealed by mobs. Never before in the world has so much been done for education. General Hawkins seems to think that our country was demoralized by the war. They who fight for the right are not degraded; they are ennobled. When men face death and march to the mouths of guns for a principle, they grow great; they come out of the conflict with added moral grandeur; they become better men, better citizens, and love more intensely than ever the great cause, for the success of which they put their lives in pawn. During the civil war, the North grew great and the South was educated. Never before in the history of mankind was there such a period of moral exaltation. The names that shed the brightest, the whitest light on the pages of our history, became famous then. Against the few who were actuated by base and unworthy motivs, let us set the great army that fought for the republic—the millions who bared their breasts to the storm, the hundreds and hundreds of thousands who did their duty honestly, nobly, and went back to their children, with no thought except to preserve the liberties of themselvs and their fellow-men.

Nowhere in the world is honesty in business esteemed more highly than here. There are millions of business men—merchants, bankers, and others—engaged in trades and professions, to whom reputation is as dear as life. Is it possible that free institutions tend to the demoralization of men? Is a man dishonest because he is a man and maintains the rights of men? In order to be a moral nation, must we be controled by king or emperor? Is human liberty a mistake? Is it possible that a citizen of the great republic attacks the liberty of his fellow-citizens? Is he willing to abdicate? Is he willing to admit that his rights are not equal to the rights of others? Is he, for the sake of what he calls morality, willing to become a serf, a servant, or a slave? Is it possible that high character is improbable in a republic? Is it the experience of General Hawkins? Is it true that intellectual achievement pays no dividends? Is it not a fact that America is to-day the best market in the world for books, for music, and for art? There is in our country no real foundation for these wide and sweeping slanders.

This is the best government and this is the best country in the world. The citizens of this republic are, on the average, better clothed and fed and educated than any other people. They are fuller of life, more progressiv, quicker to take advantage of the forces of nature than any other of the children of men. Here the burdens of government are lightest, the responsibilities of the individuals greatest, and here, without doubt, are to be worked out the most important problems of social science. Here, in America, is a finer sense of what is due from man to man than you will find in other lands. We do not cringe to those whom chance has crowned. We stand erect. Our sympathies are strong and quick. Generosity is almost a national failing. The hand of honest want is rarely left unfilled. Great calamities open the hearts and hands of all. Here you will find democracy in the family, republicanism by the fireside. Say what you will, the family is apt to be patterned after the government. If a king is at the head of a nation, the husband imagins himself the monarch of the home. In this country we hav carried into the family the idea on which the government is based. Here husbands and wives are beginning to be equals. The highest test of civilization is the treatment of women and children. By this standard America stands first among the nations. There is a magnitude, a scope, a grandeur about the country, an amplitude that satisfies the heart and the imagination. We hav our faults and our virtues, but our country is the best. No American should ever write a line that can be sneeringly quoted by an enemy of the great republic.

A Letter from Mr. Heywood.

STATE PRISON, P. O. BOX 100, CHARLESTOWN, MASS.,
June 22, YL 19

DEAR MR. MACDONALD: Andrews the Pantarch used to say that, of all tyrannies, the despotism of propriety is the most irrational, stupid, and merciless. The burnings, beheadings, and hangings, under old Acts of Uniformity, were for alleged difference of opinion as to religion; now all the tortures public opinion allows are inflicted on dissenters from "authority" in morals. Of course every usurper knows that the outs always outnumber the ins, and that, in Daniel Webster's words, "The right of revolution always exists." The present administration is built on "blocks of five," purchased votes in New York, Indiana, and other states. Praying always goes with bribed perjury, so Sunday-school Wanamaker leads devotion to the "loaves and fishes." At a recent public "religious" dinner in Worcester an intense "anti-saloon" Republican, Rev. George H. Gould, D.D., presided, and His Obscenity, "Annie E. Ray," "E. Edgewell," "Mrs. Farnsworth," alias Anthony Comstock, was the high-placed, right-hand spokesman. But it's all in style, what's "proper" to put "big money" into doctors' and ministers' pockets, per monopoly of sex knowledge. When Dr. F. Hallick published his large book on "Sex Life," which sells for $6, he sent a copy to Comstock, asking him if it was "obscene;" the censor reported back that "the book is not obscene at that price." The "crime" of which Mr. Harman and I are judged "guilty" is the putting into cheap pamphlets or newspapers words and facts which circulate without restriction in expensiv medical works. It is "improper," "vulgar," for common people to know what brings "ducats" to doctors and ministers. But whatever Mr. Harman or I may or may not hav done, we neither of us hav had the hardihood to try to mail the Bible or the speeches of some Republican Congressmen!

The pious "spotters" are now cock-sure of their "duty" to suppress lotteries; yet, not to mention big gambling in boards of trade and stock exchanges, the God business is the cheekiest "game of chance" ever licensed. What money "Merciful Heavens Wanamaker" (as Anna Dickinson calls him) puts up to save souls, by God! A ticket in a turkey, sewing-machine, church lottery, or in the Louisiana grab-bag, is nothing compared with the heavy stakes in soul gambling fat ministers and "fat-fried" pew players hold. The common lottery is the most innocent kind of betting indulged in. P. T. Barnum earned his first money selling lottery tickets. Dudley S. Gregory, president of the Lottery Association in New York 1835–1843, and afterward member of Congress with Greeley, saved Horace Greeley to journalism by lottery advertising in the New Yorker. Land monopoly, tariffs, bank, mail, and God monopolies impose gambling, stupendous villainies which make earth hell; yet all these high-stepping Christians are plutocratic rulers! And in this "decoy," "spotter," lying-for-Christ's-sake-and-the-money-it-fetches crowd a federal cabinet officer, devout John Wanamaker, leads the preying band.

This relentless, malicious, mercenary persecution of opinions recalls the English Bedford Jail case (1658–1672): "Then went the jury out whose names were Mr. Blindman, Mr. Nogood, Mr. Malice, Mr. Lovelust, Mr. Liveloose, Mr. Heady, Mr. Highmind, Mr. Enmity, Mr. Liar, Mr. Cruelty, Mr. Hatelight, and Mr. Implacable, who, everyone, gave in his private verdict against him, among themselvs, and afterward unanimously concluded to bring him in guilty before the judge. And, first among themselvs, Mr. Blindman, the foreman, said: 'I see clearly that this man is a heretic.' Then said Mr. Nogood: 'Away with such a fellow from the earth!' 'Ay,' said Mr. Malice, 'for I hate the very look of him.' Then said Mr. Lovelust, 'I could never endure him.' 'Nor I,' said Mr. Liveloose, 'for he would be always condemning my way.' 'Hang him! Hang him!' said Mr. Heady. 'A sorry scrub,' said Mr. Highmind. 'My heart curseth against him,' said Mr. Enmity. 'He is a rogue,' said Mr. Liar. 'Hanging is too good for him,' said Mr. Cruelty. 'Let us dispatch him out of the way,' said Mr. Hatelight. Then said Mr. Implacable, 'Might I hav all the world given me I could not be reconciled to him; therefore, let us forthwith bring him in guilty of death" (Pilgrim's Progress).

So speak the persecuting passions against Faithful, in the persons of Train, Lant, Foote, Bennett, or whomsoever else is "tried" by the religio-political knaves now constituting "purity" courts. Though the Carpenter-Wanamaker-Foster censors out-devil the judge or any of the jurymen in Bunyan's case; while now, as then, Faithful, the "criminal," knows himself guiltless before the condemning crowd, and that what he is "punished" for is solely the good in him.

But who shall decide as to what is "proper?" Rev. Joseph Cook was once caged as a raving maniac; the ministers pardoned him out. I was jailed as "obscene;" the politicians pardoned me out. What does it settle? Is Cook sane, or am I pure? Our ancestors saw it was not right or safe to allow judges, juries, or magistrates to decide questions of religion. But why put moral questions to vote? The guarantees of religious liberty in the federal and all our state constitutions include moral freedom. Hence this obscenity pretense is illegal from the start, and a scandalous outrage on the first principles of associativ order. The human body must be recognized and respected in all its parts and uses. The silked, satined, broadclothed Christians, who, behind sleek spans, roll in gorgeous splendor to church, in the name of a Christ who went barefoot, are ashamed of Jesus in their own sex-nature, and that's "what's the matter with Hannah" in Comstock-Wanamaker-Carpenter "purity." In building his Pantarchal millennium Andrews, of course, recognized diversity of opinion, habit, action in religion, morals, law—everything that concerns human destiny, relying on liberty, not on coercion, to assure order and propriety. Though it discredits Bellamy's intellect to suppose that he himself sees anything more than a good joke and the money it fetches in "Looking Backward," yet it is quite possible that he is fool enough to really think that labor thrift is possible under military despotism, beneath a sky of swords. I am in Bellamy's heaven, state prison, and don't see the good of it. Away with acts of uniformity, imposed propriety, supervising censorship, and giv us opportunity and reciprocity!

EZRA H. HEYWOOD.

Items of Foreign Freethought News.

Republicanism and Freethought work hand in hand in Spain and are making great progress.

Mr. Zielowsky, of Freiburg, Germany, has been sentenced to three months' imprisonment because of "disrespectful" remarks concerning the Roman Catholic church.

In the year 1890 the priests in Belgium took in over seventeen million francs in donations and for prayers promised to be said to help miserable souls out of purgatory.

During the forced exile of Dr. Voelkel, Mrs. A. Voelkel has taken charge of his Free Religious Sunday Paper, but the doctor will contribute the usual good editorials.

The Freethinkers of Stockholm recently held a meeting protesting against religious teachings in the public schools. Messrs. Lennstrand, Wicksell, and Holmberg and Captain Thomson spoke. The meeting was well attended.

Our French friends are, as usual, pushing forward, and the past month has given birth to a comic Bible with very wicked pictures. We hav not seen it, but our Dutch contemporary De Dageraad (Daybreak) says it is admirable.

In the state prison at Zwickau, Saxony, they use a hymn-book in which is found a psalm beginning with the words, "Through his great goodness God has brought me here." We do not doubt the truth of the statement in some instances, at least.

The monthly Bulletin of the French Freethought Federation states that M. Hulbert, one of the chamber of deputies, givs as his opinion that between two hundred and twenty and two hundred and thirty deputies are opposed to the budget des cultes—the subsidies to religious bodies and to the embassy to the Vatican.

When Victor E. Lennstrand was in trouble our English friends rendered him and the cause timely aid by forwarding money. Now a subscription is being taken up for the benefit of Mrs. A. Voelkel. Naturally the doctor's income will be considerably less now, since the banishment renders it impossible for him to lecture.

The Swedish daily paper Fäderneslandet contains a long article treating the subject of the state church, and figures out that the church costs Sweden 7,567,874 crowns in hard cash every year. Besides this, the church property (exempt from taxation) is estimated (rather low, we think) at 58,720 905 crowns. And what does the church giv in exchange?

The German Freethought congress for the year 1891 is now a thing of the past. Dr. Voelkel, at present an exile in Switzerland, spoke about "The Testament of the Rev. Father Meslier," a forerunner to modern Freethought. We will in the next number of THE TRUTH SEEKER giv an account of the congress, which in every way was a great success.

Freethought is growing in Denmark. A lawyer stated recently at a meeting of Danish Freethinkers, says a correspondent to Fritänkaren, that every other lawyer in Copenhagen is a Freethinker, but that they are prevented from working for the cause by the fact that they would immediately lose their official positions; and that the same is the case with many ministers.

Henry V. Berghell will soon visit this country. He has escaped the clutches of Alexander III., the Danish congress by a vote of 116 against 86 refusing to deliver him to the Russian police. May 31st Mr. Berghell gave a lecture in the great hall of Sortedamslunden, Copenhagen, Denmark. The hall was crowded to suffocation, and the speaker was frequently applauded. The Copenhagen daily paper Aftenposten in a long and very favorable report says: "It is as if one listened to Bradlaugh delivering one of his lectures to London workingmen. Like Bradlaugh, Berghell uses but few gesticulations; like him, he has a manner of speaking earnest and appealing; there are the same striking illustrations, and the same power to hold his audience." Scandinavians in the central states and the West will probably soon hav the pleasure of listening to radical Freethought lectures from this exiled martyr for free thought and free speech.

Some Problems in Nature.

ORIGIN OF LIFE.

When I was a boy, living in Winston county, Miss., my father would burn the heart out of big pine logs and use them for tan vats, and tan his own hides, and make the family's shoes. He used wood ashes instead of lime to take the hair off the hides, and after the hair was taken off he put the hides into the creek for a while to soak the alkali out of them before putting them in tan. On one occasion, in the summer, when the creek was not running, he sent me and two of my older brothers to take some hides out of a hole of stagnant water. We found a great many worms swimming in the pool, and my brothers called them hair-worms. I, being of an inquisitiv, scrutinizing disposition, went to investigating them, and found them in every stage of development, from the hair as it came off the hide up to a living, activ white worm two or three lines in diameter and from one and a half to two inches long. Occasionally a hair had only been transformed for a part of its length and made a short worm with a hair for a tail. I hav seen many of these hair-worms in the tan vats, and every other man who has tanned hides in the same way has seen these worms in the tan vats, and knows that animal hairs can develop into living worms. When a child, I once, during a rainy spell of weather, found moving in a little pool of water what I took to be a little snake, and commenced talking about what a queer little snake I had found, when father told me that it was a hair-worm, that it was a hair changed to a worm. It was a living, creeping thing developed from a hair which came out of the switch of a cow's tail. I hav since seen many of this kind of worms during long spells of wet weather. I once found in a pool of water in the road a wad of hair cut off the switch of a cow's tail, locked and twisted together, which had just developed life enough to be possessed of the power of motion, and were working like a bundle of snakes interlocked and twisted together. Now, I hav seen it stated somewhere that scientific men dispute this fact, that hair can develop into living animals. Facts are stubborn things, and scientific authority cannot crush a fact. And like the Texas sewing-machine agent, 'I am not afraid of men mostly," and when I know that I hav found the truth I am not afraid of criticism from any source.

Now, these hair-worms are very insignificant things, but we can come nearer seeing and knowing how life originates, and what life is, here than anywhere else in nature that I know of, and the little hair-worms furnish us a clew to the solution of the great problem of life.

SOLUTION.

The hairs hav open tubes or capillaries running through them lengthwise, through which they draw the elements of nutrition from the blood of the cow, and perhaps hav nerve filaments through or along which the electric currents course while attached to the cow. When placed in water of a proper temperature holding in solution, already digested and prepared for assimilation, the elements of animal nutrition which hav been drawn from either animal or vegetable matter, the fluid is drawn into the hair by capillary attraction and the chemical affinity of the particles of matter. Chemical action takes place; the elements of nutrition are assimilated; electric currents are developed; life, motion, and intelligence become manifest.

These hair-worms hav neither eyes nor heads, yet they are possessed of intelligence, which may be discovered by watching them work their way through a bed of forest leaves or fine straw. When they strike an obstruction they feel about until they find a way they can pass.

Here we can see a development of life, motion, and intelligence from inanimate and inert matter, and there is nothing to do the work except material atoms and molecules associated with electricity. Constructiv organic action is life. Destructiv organic action is death.

Herein lies another problem which is insoluble, and it is of no use to discuss it, viz.: Wherein lies the intelligence and force, the deity? Is it in the electricity, in the material, or is it in both? As we cannot disassociate matter and electricity to examin them separately, we can never settle this question. One may hold that the intelligence and force belongs to matter. No one can disprove it. Another may hold that electricity is the force and intelligence. No one can disprove it. Another may hold that it belongs to the two combined. No one can disprove it.

Jottings.

I flatter myself that among all the readers of our TRUTH SEEKER there are some who will like to know where Aunt Elmina is and what she is doing and enjoying.

Well, she is in clover just now at the famous De Garmo Institute, in Fishkill-on-Hudson, N. Y. The building is situate on a hill and the view from all sides is just lovely. Hills, valleys, mountains, groves, and woodlands, houses dotted in and half embowered in trees, vines, and flowers. Brown roads curving in and about, and the shrill whistle of the iron horse sounding ever and anon, make one feel as if it was truly a center of civilization. It is school vacation now and I shall hav a nice time visiting with my sister among our old-time friends and relativs.

Mr. De Garmo is the head of the school and his wife, two daughters, and a son are all teachers, so I am in an atmosphere of educational influences. Books, papers, and magazines are on all sides.

Fishkill is an old town, and, including Mattewan, it has about twelve thousand inhabitants—and is rather more than usually pious, but one has no need to obtrude one's sharp corners, so I think I shall hav a really nice, pleasant visit. I intend remaining all summer.

I left the depot in old Virginia at 9 P.M., June 15th, and in less than twenty-four hours was here.

After leaving Virginia I found a great increase of comfort and convenience on the cars and they ran much more smoothly than on Southern roads, and everything around bespoke Yankee thrift and go-ahead-ativness. The people, streets, houses, and even roads, were all cleaner, neater, and more snug-looking. Depots, stores, shops, and all public places were scoured and cleaned. Cleanliness may be next to godliness, but it is certainly a greater virtue and one very conduciv to health and happiness. More anon.

My address will be Fishkill-on-the-Hudson, N. Y., for three months to come. The Snowville address will always reach me. Letters from old friends are doubly welcome when one is in a new place.

Affectionately, ELMINA DRAKE SLENKER

How to Help The Truth Seeker.

1. When renewing get a friend to subscribe and thus save a half dollar apiece.

2. Get your newsdealer to display it on his stand or in his shop window. Be sure that he displays the pictures.

3. Get your newsdealer to keep in stock one or more copies, with your guarantee to take off his hands at the end of the week any that remain unsold. If he exhibits them the pictures alone will sell them.

4. Take a few extra copies and circulate them among your acquaintances. On your request, we will send you back-number sample copies free.

5. Leave a copy occasionally where it will be picked up—in the train, in the factory, in the meeting-room, in the cigar store, in the barber-shop. Leave it picture-side up.

6. Keep in your pocket some of our cheap tracts, and when convenient hand one to a friend.

7. Get a new subscriber by persuading some friend to take it.

THE Rev. Dr. Hawthorne of Atlanta, Ga., is another of the "divines" who talk much nonsense, revealing when talking of Infidelity a profound ignorance of this subject. In a recent sermon, for instance, Mr. Hawthorne said this: "When a man, who has been activ in the church and who has loudly protested unflinching fealty to Christ, breaks away from Christianity and makes shipwreck of his faith, we may expect him to sink into the deepest depravity and to oppose the Bible and all that is good and holy with fiendish intensity and malignity. Tell me, ye who fulminate your Infidel wrath against the religion of the Bible, was there ever a man made better by forsaking Christ and the church? If Christianity be a cheat and a delusion, why hav the men who hav deserted its author fallen so low? If Christianity be false and it be a virtue to renounce it, why do we find the extremest types of human depravity in men who hav gone out from under the banner of Christ and ranged themselvs around the standard of its foes? I invoke the haters of our God and his cause to giv us the history of the men who hav apostatized from the faith of the gospel. Did apostasy promote the growth of their virtue? Did they in their apostasy possess the moral qualities which you would like to see reproduced in your children? No. In your secret soul you despise the man who turns traitor to Christ. You are always suspicious of him. You never giv him your confidence. Deep down in your breast there is the conviction that the man who parts with God parts with virtue." There is nothing in Christianity which makes a man particularly virtuous, as the innumerable number of Christian rascals shows; nor are Christian nations so moral as the so-called "heathen" nations. As a matter of fact there hav been many men made better by forsaking the church. That very act develops honesty. And as another matter of fact the "extremest types of human depravity" are Christians. The thieves, pugilists, roughs, prostitutes, low saloonkeepers, gamblers, are almost without exception Christians of the most superstitious sort. These things are all capable of demonstration, and Dr. Hawthorne in saying what he did simply wrote himself down as one who knew absolutely nothing of what he was talking about.

A Truth Seeker's Creed.

Then Agrippa said unto Paul, almost thou persuadest me to be a Christian.

I believe and know it is best to use all spoken and written words so as to be understood, to express intelligent, rational thought for enlightenment and instruction in the useful lessons, and this for the practical purpose of promoting the individual and general good. In this sense alone I shall endeavor to use them in defining my creed. And as it consists of stating both what I believe or know and what I do not believe, it is a part of my creed not to use words to misrepresent, to mislead the mind, to insult the reason, ignore the understanding, and to intellectually wrong those taught.

In defining my creed I shall revert to that primitiv use of words when in their earlier simplicity they were made for practical service and mutual benefit.

In this sense I believe in or know good; sometimes spelled gute, gutt, Gott, chod, and God. I believe in or know God, in three Gods, in many gods or goods, because I hav felt them in my experience, in their variety, as physical, social, moral, and mental gods. I believe in or know one good and many goods, and so am therefore a monotheist and polytheist in this original, rational sense. I do not know or believe in any good, Gott, or God that is an incomprehensible abstraction, or that is a demoniac personality, an ideal monster of the lunatic or of the wild imagination of the religious enthusiast, to frighten and subdue the ignorant; for I see no good, gute, Gott, or God there.

I do not believe in an idol made after the pattern of the Jewish Jehovah. I do believe it best that "Thou shalt not make to thyself any graven image, nor the likeness of anything that is in heaven above, or in the earth beneath, or in the water under the earth. Thou shalt not bow down to them or worship them."

I believe or know the light and heat of the sun are good or gute; so I believe in a good sun, in a sun of good or of Gott of the ancient sun worshipers; but I do not believe in changing this sun of Gott into a s-o-n of God—into a personality, an idol, or image of anything in the heavens or the earth, for those that pervert the good in this way shall be visited with the evil that will follow it, "to the third and fourth generation." I believe this.

I believe in the gute or Gott of Jesus when he says, "I am in it and it is in me"—not him and he, for good, Gott, or God is neither masculin or feminin; and in many more passages where he makes good in himself or others local or general, all of the same origin and a common inheritance of the race. I believe with Paul, as expressed in figurativ language when he says: "Know ye not that ye are the temple of good or gutt and that the spirit of good dwelleth in you?" And in many more passages, which should hav been translated good instead of misspelled G-o-d. For on the testimony of the late revisers of the Bible the word God as a personality should not hav been put into that volume (see Companion to the Revised Old Testament, p. 171).

I believe in predestination in its normal, biological sense; that the physical and spiritual, mental and moral, endowments that constituted man in his prehistoric state, as represented in the fable of creation by the names Adam, Cain, and Abel, are predestined in the order of nature, through the laws of inheritance, to be the composit elements that enter into that animal structure we call man, as long as he continues a human being on earth. The fabulous Adam and his sons had inherited from their progenitors—the animals from which they descended, or from which they were made—the conflicting forces that are activ in all the higher animals; and from ignorance and inexperience they made mistakes, and such will be the fate of all their posterity through the law of transmission.

I believe in the law of variation; that the progeny will not all be precise types of the parents; that some of the offspring, following the type of earlier progenitors, will inherit superior or inferior organizations; the former of which, through natal advantages, is predestined to be saved from the ills and misfortunes to which the latter is inevitably doomed.

In this scientific sense I believe in election and reprobation.

I believe also, so long as the virtues, and vices or weaknesses, of parents are cherished and remembered by generations of descendants, they become immortal or eternal in the ideal, while physically and biologically they will, in the scientific sense, be eternal and everlasting as physiological or constitutional properties of the race.

I believe in or know the Greek Jeshu Christo, the Latin Jesus Christ, alias the English saving wisdom—as taught in the epistles of Paul, "the power of good and wisdom of good"—and I am determined to teach nothing else than the wisdom and goodness (not the weakness and faults) of him that was crucified, notwithstanding it was then "a stumbling-block to the Jews and foolishness to the Greeks."

I believe in, or know, wisdom and goodness as the only messiah or savior of man from ignorance, superstition, degradation, and crime, and the suffering they entail. They will save him not only to-day but to-morrow, and through all the futures of his life.

I believe in future life and future rewards and punishments in this primitiv, practical sense, as the ancient philosophers and sages taught it, but not in the corrupted theological sense as taught by the priests to the ignorant multitudes.

I believe, or know, that the shedding of blood or destroying of life has indirectly worked the remission of sins, as such tragic acts hav startled the emotions, excited the feelings, and aroused the lethargic to action for self-preservation, when milder influences failed to enlist their attention or engage their efforts for protection. In this way their sins of indolence and indifference to wrong hav been remitted.

I believe in the atonement thus made for past shortcomings and unfaithfulness.

I believe in, or know, the Holy Ghost or Holy Spirit, alias good ghosts and good spirits, as taught in Greece since the days of Aristotle. But the terms expressing them modern science has somewhat modified. The word "ghost" has been changed first to geist, and than abbreviated to gas, as we now use it. Oxygen is the holy or good ghost, gas that preserves and sustains life. Carbon is the unholy or evil gas that injures and destroys life. These evil or do-evil ghosts, or demons, or gases, the Greeks found in caves and low reservoirs where they had accumulated then as they do now, even to the extent of destroying the lives of those who breathe them. I believe, or know, that these poisonous holes are the hells infested with the demons, or fiends, or ghosts, or gases, that torment and destroy all those who are bad, from a want of the Jesus Christi, alias the "saving wisdom" that would preserve them from entering into them.

I believe in, or know of, the holy or good spirit, as found in Grecian alchemy and as taught in our holy books. I believe or know there are many spirits, as taught in modern chemistry, but which were derived from the Greek scientists. We hav spirits of wine, spirits of niter, spirits of ammonia, of salt, of camphor, and many other kinds.

Some of these spirits are soothing, grateful, and sedativ, when taken into the human stomach. They are good spirits, alias holy spirits. Some are acrid, pungent, distasteful, poisonous, and destructiv. These are evil or malignant spirits or demons.

These evil spirits are "legion," and many of them, if swallowed or entered into a person, cannot be cast out by fasting or prayer, but hold possession, making their victim violent and dangerous and not unfrequently destroying his life. The spirits of wine will do it.

I also believe in the "spirit" as Paul taught it in the Hebrew sense, in which he tried to explain it to the Greeks; as consisting in the temper, feelings, motivs, and desires of men, and as manifested in their conduct and characters toward each other, in some cases without having imbibed them in poisonous liquids.

When the conduct and bearing of men toward each other are gentle, kind, just, faithful, charitable, sympathetic, and benevolent, they are moved by the holy or good spirit. They hav received the holy spirit, or the spirit of gott, gute, or good, and do works meet for the spirit. The good or holy spirit manifests itself in various other ways; as in "the spirit of inquiry," "the spirit of truth," "the spirit of liberty," "the spirit of research." Paul says: "The spirit searchest all things, even the deep things of God." He says those guided by this spirit "shall judge the angels." He enjoins on his disciples to "try the spirits." All of which I know or believe in as a part of my creed. I also believe in or know of evil spirits in this last sense, as exhibited in revenge, cruelty, malice, vindictivness, intolerance, hatred, and the like. I believe in evil spirits or the do-evil (devil) and his angels in this original sense. I believe or know what it is to be moved by the spirit or a spirit. I claim to be and know I am moved by the spirit of truth, and the spirit of gute, Gott, good, or God, as it is now spelled in English, to help cast out the do-evil spirit that dwells in the mind of those who sit in darkness, who in their blindness and ignorance cannot tell right from wrong, and are slaves to vices, crimes, and cruelties, being kept so by their superstitious guides, their ignorant and unqualified teachers.

To be moved by the holy spirit to do an act is to be prompted by the honest, intelligent conviction that the thing should be done for a personal, a local, or the general good. A motion without the spirit is a sham, a form, an abortion, without life or worth.

I do not believe in taking out or trying to take out of man this quality, this element of enthusiasm that givs vigor, force, purpose, or virtue to his deeds and desires—which we call his spirit, or the spirit—and transplanting it among the immaterial entities, in the shape of an organized, impalpable personality, to be summoned or invoked, to be waited on and worshiped, till it deigns to descend and close in with the suppliant. I do not believe that all this is necessary, nor that it is sufficient to qualify or enable a man to be "moved by the spirit."

This spirit is the theological creation of Grecian, mythological parentage. It is one of those natural gifts or forces in man which they believed was produced and presided over by a demon.

I believe in water baptism (immersion). "He that believeth in it and is baptized shall be saved."

"He that believeth not [in baptism] shall be damned" with dirt and all its filthy concomitants; from the evils and curses of which no faith can save him. Baptism is orthodox and as old as man. I believe in its frequent use to save man from the sin or evil of personal filthiness.

I believe in the "supper" when there is an appetite for it, and I believe special suppers are sometimes prepared and eaten to commemorate unusual occasions and events, as recorded in an example of centuries ago, when a Jewish teacher ate with his disciples on the evening preceding his crucifixion and martyrdom.

I believe in a future life, and in future rewards and punishments; for I know that every living man has a future life longer or shorter before him, and it depends on how the past and present are spent, how great or small will be the rewards and punishments in the future.

I believe in everlasting life, or in life lasting as long as ever it can—in living so as to protract it to its full length; and that right living will be rewarded with happiness and tend to prolong it.

I also believe that vice and crime or evil living will bring future punishments, by destroying health, happiness, and safety, and so abridging life that it will not ever last out the full term, or be everlasting—which is the sense in which the ancients used it (see Canon Farrar's writings and sermons).

I also believe in everlasting life in that more extended sense we gain of it from history and experience. As we hav no knowledge or conception of the period when life began, neither can we hav any of when it shall end. From the data we hav, we cannot conclude otherwise than that it will continue as a species forever, an everlasting form of life. Whoever looks at life in this light without the theological bias cannot fail to see that it is the most logical and rational aspect the question presents to the understanding. The facts of nature favor it, and a contrary view would be only an assumption, a hypothesis that has nothing to sustain it but the ghostly speculations of those who wish to barter their other world's wares for the good things of this world.

I believe in inspiration in its practical, rational sense—that every breathing thing inspires, and that animal life would soon become extinct without it. Figurativly we may use the word to represent the taking in, absorbing, or imbibing thoughts, impressions, pictures, or images, through the senses, which excite the emotions and prompt to deeds.

I believe the inspiration may be of or to good or Gott, or to do-evil, devil; or it may be mixed; it may prompt men to write books good or evil or mixed. In this sense the Bible is the product of inspiration. But to say that it is all the inspiration of Gott or good is but an attempt of the priesthood to deceive and enslave the minds of the ignorant in the interests of the church and superstition.

I do not believe in running all these prime articles of my creed into the ground, the grave, or earth below, or into the heavens above, and in pretending to make them serve the dead after they hav moldered away into the dust.

I believe that all the articles of an orthodox creed were originally made for the benefit of the living; that they all had adaptation and application to purposes and uses of life, and were appropriate to aid in human advancement in this world; and I do not believe in the flagrant usurpations of theologians, who, in order to make capital to carry on their schemes to frighten the people into their service, hav endeavored to rob the living of their uses and transfer them to the dead, whom they claim to resurrect into another world.

All the minutiæ of detail and appendage that properly belong to and hav grown out of this creed, of which space forbids the enumeration, but which are essential to human salvation, I accept and believe with the foregoing, in that sense where they are conduciv in aiding man to intelligent, rational views, and in lifting him out of barbarism, by adding to his stock of useful knowledge and promoting his intellectual culture and refinement.

But I do not believe in the dehumanizing uses the priesthood has made of every good influence or attribute belonging to or affecting man, to subjugate him to a belief of the constant pressure of the supernatural, paralyzing his hopes and powers of selfhood.

I believe that this rational creed, in part, as here set forth, originated in fragments many centuries ago, among the earlier thinkers and philosophers of old civilization in India, China, Greece, and Egypt.

These early students of life and metaphysics formulated their experiences and observations into rational systems of thought and placed them on record; and fragments of them in successiv accretions are found pervading all ancient religious literature as taught by the legendary avatars and incarnations long anterior to the Jewish theocracy. All religions among the civilized are founded on these ethical truths. So that there is really only one religion; but many creeds, growing out of the different degrees of enlightenment.

The ancient philosophers who taught the rational views of religion as indicated in my creed were Thales, Pittacus, Pythagoras, Anaxagoras, Pericles, Socrates, Aristodemus, Plato, Aristotle, Proclus, Cicero, Zeno, Seneca, Strabo, Plutarch, Juvenal, Pliny, and others.

They were largely obtained from the Vedas, but were heresy to the ignorant masses, and were often secretly taught in metaphor under oath to intelligent friends only.

These ancient names are honored now, while their rational views are discarded. The allegories and fables they used in which their lessons were veiled, hav been accepted as literal facts, are the foundation of modern orthodoxy, and stilted before our mental vision with the dignified appellation of a divine revelation, of a "scheme of redemption" contrived to save a sinful world.

I believe the different Christian creeds, in some measure, show the state of enlightenment of the various sects.

The Catholic creed was formulated by and adapted to a barbarian and benighted period of Europe; to a people who could not understand or appreciate the wise and thoughtful lessons of ancient philosophy; so these were corrupted by turning them into a personified system of superstitious idolatry, to adapt them to the low mental and moral condition of those whom it was aimed to convert from paganism and gather into the church. Protestantism or the Reformation was an effort in the direction of restoring the faith in some degree toward its original philosophical and practical purity.

Now that Europe and America hav so far emerged from barbarism, there should be no longer a need for the religion or the creeds prepared for a lower class of people; a religion tending to retain us where our benighted ancestors stood and to obstruct us in going forward, or backward rather, to the ancient canons of philosophy, as taught by the earlier civilizations.

I stand by the creed of the fathers; by that creed or faith that meets the intelligent, rational wants of life, that is adapted to every contingency and adequate to every necessity; a creed based on reason, science, and philosophy, and revealing to the mind what can be known of life and of the needs to make it, and of it, all there is possibly in it, for now and all the future. The Largest Broods of Buzzards Ever Hatched.

Sins, whether committed by individuals or nations, are sure, like chickens or buzzards, to come home to roost, and land robbery is the greatest sin ever committed. It has hatched more buzzards and cursed the human race more than any other crime except religion. I am not in favor of violence where it can possibly be avoided, but will say here and now that if the working classes had arisen and hanged the first president that ever sold an acre of land and every member of Congress that consented to it, higher than Haman, our country now would be millions of dollars better off than it is. Every man, and woman too, has just the same natural birthright to land enough to build a home and raise food on, that he or she has to sunlight, air, or water; and any government that robs them of that right is on a level with highway robbers and should be treated accordingly. All that any government should ever hav to do with the land is to lay it out in roads, streets, villages, and city and farm lots, and each man or woman that comes for a lot should be permitted to take his or her choice by paying only the expense of surveying and making the deed, and no one should be permitted to own or occupy more than he and his own family can cultivate.

The government should protect each one in his right to such lots and carefully preserve the balance of the land from being stripped of its forests until wanted by future settlers; and all valuable mines should be held by the government—the whole people—and worked by the government or let at fair prices, instead of being sold to shylocks for a song as they now are.

If this plan had been carried out by our government from its commencement, we should not now hear of strikes for higher nor against lower wages, should hav no need of pauper-houses and very little use for prisons. No one would hav had room for slavery, no occasion to flood the country with the people of Africa. All would hav homes of their own and land on which to raise food.

Land robbery hatched the big buzzard, slavery. It made slaves of the white as well as the colored people. I was born in a new country among smutty stumps; and when a boy knew scores of men who ran in debt to government and shylocks to redeem their stolen land, and went into the wilderness from three to twenty miles, guided by spotted trees without a road, built log-cabins, cleared up the land, and worked till they were fifty, sixty, or seventy years of age, selling the best of all they raised and living on the poorest, before they got stolen land redeemed, after paying for it two or three times over in interest! This discouraged most of their sons and drove them to other business, and now all other employments are overstocked with hands underbidding each other in their labors to avoid starvation. The majority of white landless laborers are just as much slaves now as the colored people of the South were before the war. Land robbery has driven millions into drunkenness and all manner of crimes; it would take many large volumes to write its history.

Yes, land robbery hatched slavery. And just think what a curse slavery was to the colored race! Hundreds of thousands of men, women, and children were stolen from Africa, brought to our shores, and sold at auction like brute beasts. Husbands and wives, parents and children, brothers and sisters, with sensibilities and affections as keen as our own, were separated for life, thousands of them falling into the hands of cruel people who made their whole existence a scene of misery.

And this was all done in accordance with an accursed old book that was falsely called God's holy word! A book that has done more harm than any other published! A book in which one man says God is impartial; in which another writes God is supreme in wisdom, power, justice, love, and mercy; and in which another writes: "With thy money thou mayest buy bondmen and bondwomen of the heathen round about thee, and if thou beat thy bondman that he die, nevertheless, if he livs three days after the beating it is nobody's business, for he is thy money." And to prepare the master for beating his bondsman to death the holy humbug and fraud of a book says: "With thy money thou mayest buy wine or strong drink or whatsoever thy soul lusteth after." Filled up with strong drink a cruel man was in pretty good order to beat his bondman to death. Many of the Southern slaveholders were noble men and treated their bondmen so kindly that thousands of them were unwilling to leave when liberated; but there were cruel, passionate men there as well as here, who treated their slaves as cruelly as some here do their beasts; half starved, whipped, and sometimes killed them—and according to that despicable old book it was all right.

Yes, land robbery hatched slavery, and slavery hatched the late war, which killed nearly a million of the most robust men in the nation, leaving the runts and imbecils to breed from, making it necessary to build homes for weak-minded children. The war has left thousands of cripples, widows, and orphans, who are receiving millions of dollars every year in the shape of pensions.

These are only a few of the sins that the great sin of land robbery has hatched, and others are still brooding that people are too stupid to think of, that will yet want roosts. Yours in truth and love,

Vineland, N. J. J. HACKER.

Has Jehovah an Intellect?

Is the God of the Christians an intelligent being? I ask this question in all seriousness. I ask it in no spirit of mockery, nor would I offend the feelings of the most sensitiv believer; but I honestly ask those who believe in Jehovah if they consider their God an intelligent being. Jesus said that the very hairs of their heads were numbered and not a sparrow fell to the ground without the knowledge of his father. If this God then directs the way of his people, why is it they are so prone to evil and so subject to accident and misfortune? With a heavenly father to keep account of the hairs of their heads and to provide food and raiment for them, as he does for the sparrows and the lilies of the field, why is it that our prisons, asylums, and poorhouses are filled with the faithful? Why is it that they are struck down by the lightnings or dashed to death by the storms which are supposed to be the principal agencies to show the power of their God? If the children of God were exempt from his lightnings, and his cyclones, and his pestilence, and his earthquakes, then, indeed, we might say he had them in his keeping, but such is not the case.

Our churches are built by the contributions of devout Christians. The poor giv of their scanty substance and scarcely a church steeple points toward the skies that is not raised by the contributions of the poor. The priest harps upon the supposed idea that "God loves the cheerful giver," and many a ragged, destitute human has drawn on his or her scanty earnings to build a magnificent temple to this omnipotent God (?).

A few years ago a great hurricane swept over this beautiful city and in its track it left in ruins two churches built by the poor negroes. They had erected these buildings with their scanty contributions. The poor washerwoman and the day laborer had denied themselvs the very necessaries of life that they might giv something to build their God a house. But the storm swept over the city; it passed over the saloon, it swept around the brothel, but it smote upon these churches and scattered them to the four winds. Why this disregard for the feelings of his people? Why this manifestation of wrath toward his "beloved?" Would an earthly king spoil his own subjects? Would he select his own people upon whom to vent his wrath? Is this not conclusiv proof that Jehovah does not "hold the lightnings in his hand," or "ride upon the storm?" Is it not evident that he has nothing to do with the lightnings, or the storm, or that he simply cares nothing for his people?

In the deluge of Johnstown, Pa., and at the earthquake in Charleston, S. C., the churches were shattered and wrecked indiscriminately with other buildings. This God, who, we are told, loves those who trust in him and provides for the lilies and the sparrows, does not stop to protect or save his own property, or the lives and property of those who believe on him. Will sensible people never learn this?

Now, I assert that Jehovah is either powerless to protect the believer or he is grossly unmindful of him. I am willing for his followers to decide which is the fact.

In the great yellow fever pestilence in Memphis some years ago we hav another exhibition of the watchful care of this supposed deity. For months it raged. Strong men sickened and died, pure women and little babes fell before its death-dealing power, and yet, though the elect who were able to fled from out the stricken city, the poor who were forced to abide in their humble homes were sought out by this terrible scourge, and, in spite o their prayers and supplications, they fell by the hundreds, and we were told over and often that it was a "visitation of God's wrath." What a horrible idea. If the deity was angry with the people of Memphis, why did he not follow the rich to the mountains and slay them? Why did he confine himself to the poor of the city who could not flee for their lives to the cool shades of the highlands? Why smite the helpless and let the rich go unscathed?

There can be but one rational conclusion to all of this. Jehovah either is helpless to control the storms or the lightnings, or the march of disease, or he is willfully negligent and cruelly unmindful of the welfare of those who profess allegiance to him. I leave it to his followers to decide among themselvs which is the case. I for one doubt his existence, and demand some more substantial proof of the fact than the badly jumbled sentences of the Bible which says, "God created all things" and "without him was nothing made." Let the poor priest-ridden people bow before his altars, let the trembling sinner stagger up to the cross and seek to lay his crimes and sins upon the shoulders of his savior (?) and gain admittance into the celestial city to thump a golden harp alongside Lot and his daughters or with Solomon and some of his concubines; but for me, I prefer to seek that quiet land where rest the spirits of the just and the brave and the true. If there is a hereafter I for one prefer the society of Thomas Paine, Humboldt, Jefferson, Darwin, and other unbelievers to the delectable characters who figured most prominently in the Bible, such as Abraham, Jacob, Moses, Rahab the harlot, Samson, and characters of that kidney. Of course, it is a matter of taste and choice, and if the "elect" prefer to tread the golden streets of the new Jerusalem and sing hosannahs to a cruel and careless God, I hav no quarrel with them, but I do say that if God can forget them here and cares not, he is hardly worth their praise or worthy their admiration.

Nashville, Tenn. M. A. STITES.

WHAT argument was it to me when Father Nolan spoke of authority and the long line of tradition, miracle, and inspired counsel which had remained unbroken in the Romish church from the establishment of Christianity till now? Their traditions are not evidence, their miracles I disbelieved; and the councils presided over by a John XII., a Benedict IX., and an Alexander VI., did not seem to me to carry with them strong assurance of divine inspiration. For unbroken succession of teaching—hav not Indian jugglers this? Does that make their juggling miraculous according to its seeming? Could all the authority of all the popes and cardinals that ever lived prove the truth of the Incarnation? or manifest more than their own belief in it? or reconcile stories which oppose the laws of nature and deny all that science teaches? Could authority and tradition harmonize impossibilities? or make the distinct assertion, that this generation shall not pass away till such and such things be fulfilled, aught but a promis which failed to justify itself? Could any number of councils of the same church which condemned Galileo verify the standing still of the sun upon Gibeon, and of the moon in the valley of Ajalon? or the going back of the shadow on the dial ten degrees for a sign of healing to Hezekiah? Who will keep the keeper, and who will verify the verifier?—Mrs. Lynn Linton.

Dr. Briggs's Heresy.

The offense of Dr. Briggs for which he has been refused, by a vote of 440 to 59, a confirmation by the Presbyterian General Assembly to his office as professor of bib'ical theology in the Union Theological Seminary, is very clearly epitomized by the Editor of the Arena. It consists, stated broadly, in thinking a little more decently of his fellow-beings than is consistent with the Westminster Confession of Faith, which valuable document consigns most of us to hell. Dr. Briggs thinks that people will get to heaven even if they do not subscribe to that document, and he believes "in the ultimate salvation of all mankind," declaring that "redemption" is not limited to this world, but continued through the vast period of time preceding the resurrection. He maintains that there are three "great fountains of divine authority, the Bible, the church, and reason," any one of which is "capable of leading persons to God." He instances the following cases: Cardinal Newman was led to God through the church of Rome; Spurgeon, through the Bible, and the philosopher Martineau through reason. Of course to a Rationalist these propositions are meaningless, as we know nothing of God, the Bible is of unknown authorship but evidently of man's device, and Reason leads directly away from all the dogmas of Christianity. But, compared with evangelical teaching, Dr. Briggs is far ahead in intention if not in rationality.

Another assertion by Dr. Briggs for which the Presbyterians will not hastily forgiv him is "that no one could get at the Bible unless he forced his way through human obstacles," which obstacles he catalogs as follows: (1) Superstitious reverence for the book itself. (2) The belief in the verbal inspiration of the Bible. (3) The authenticity of the scriptures. Traditions from the dead church assign authors to all the books of the Bible, but higher criticism pronounces these traditions fallacies and follies. (4) The doctrin of the inerrancy of the Bible. Historical criticism again pronounces that there are errors in the Bible. (5) The miracles are in violation of the laws of nature, and keep man away from the Bible. (6) The failure of minute prophecy. This is an epitome of views which hav time and again been stated in these columns, and though Dr. Briggs has not pressed them to their logical conclusion others can do so, and arrive at the truth concerning the Christian scheme of religion—which is that it has not a leg to stand on. It is not probable, it is not reasonable, it is not possible, so far as human knowledge and experience go. It is not historical, it has no known inventors. It bears internal evidence of being the work of designing and ignorant men, it is the nursery tale of the world's youth. Regarding the alleged "inerrancy" of the Bible Dr. Briggs says: "It is agreed that there are a large number of errors in the best MSS. of the Bible; it is the theory of modern dogmaticians, that they were not in the original MSS. We can never hav them, and it is idle to speculate as to their contents. When the Lower or Textual Criticism has done its best, and secured the best possible text, dogmaticians discredit the best text when they speculate as to what was in the original text. If the reactionary dogmaticians may speculate to remove errors from the text, the rationalistic critics may also speculate with regard to the original text in a way that would make havoc with scholastic theology. I said, 'It is not a pleasant task to point out errors in the sacred scriptures.' In 'Biblical Study,' and 'Whither?' I limited myself to two errors of citation. I hav not taken a brief to prove the errancy of scripture. Conservativ men should hesitate before they force the critics in self defense to make a catalog of errors in the Bible. The errors are in the only texts we hav, and everyone is forced to recognize them. It is well known that the great reformers, Calvin and Luther, recognized errors in the scriptures, and that the choicest spirits of modern times—such as Van Oosterzee, Tholuck, Neander, Stier, Lange, and Dorner—hav not hesitated to point out numerous errors in holy scripture. This view is maintained by Sanday, Driver, Cheyne, Davidson, Bruce, Gore, Marcus Dods, Blaikie, and numerous others in Great Britain; by Fisher, Thayer, Smythe, Evans, H. B. Smith, W. R. Harper, and hosts of others in this country."

These are the views of those who hav made a serious study of the Bible, and is known as the "higher criticism." These critics are the best scholars of Germany, England, and America. But such utterances can never be reconciled with the Calvinism of the evangelical churches, more particularly the Presbyterian, which takes the Bible as it reads, and is the most logical of all the Protestant sects. Given its premises and Presbyterianism is the scheme which has most sanction from the Bible. This is pretty generally recognized. Dr. Briggs and the "higher" critics, therefore, are at swords' point with the old-fashioned people, and are yet in a large minority, as was seen in the vote against his confirmation. If he does not recant, it would seem that he must leave the sect, and he may be expelled when the charge of heresy is run through the machinery of the church in the regular way. But he cannot be burnt at the stake, nor even imprisoned, nor can his property be confiscated. If he could be gotten before a New Jersey jury he might possibly be fined for blasphemy; but even if he were a citizen of Massachusetts, the law now would not allow him to be put in the stocks, much less pressed to death under boards weighted with stones. More likely, when he leaves the Presbyterian church, he will still remain Professor of Biblical Theology in Union Seminary, or if not there, then in some less orthodox institution with an increased salary. A trial for heresy is a good advertisment, and times hav changed since Calvin hunted down Servetus and Puritans murdered their "higher critics."

The Bible.

The subjoined statement of fact was not written by an Infidel but by a Roman Catholic Christian, editor of the New York Freeman's Journal and Catholic Register, one of the few papers of that sect worthy of consideration by people who know anything. It was printed in that journal of June 20, 1891:

"Examin the Bibles promiscuously distributed in schoolrooms, and it will be found that certain portions are soiled with much use, and sometimes absolutely worn away by lecherous-minded youths; particular passages are marked to aid in more convenient reference for others; a special delight is taken by many lads to call the attention of the female element in mixed schools to certain verses, expressions, etc., whose reading and study produces the utmost disorder in both sexes."

Now, we respectfully ask Holy John Wanamaker, postmaster-general of these United States, his legal assistant, Judge Tyner, and Mr. Miller, attorney-general of the same country, if this is the sort of book to receive mail privileges under Holy John's definition of books to be excluded under the statute? The statute, it will be remembered, is as follows:

"Every obscene, lewd or lascivious book, pamphlet, picture, paper, writing, print, or other publication of an indecent character . . . is hereby declared to be non-mailable matter, and shall not be conveyed in the mails, nor delivered from any post-office, nor by any letter-carrier."

Holy John's definition of books obnoxious to this law reads:

"The statute was thus broadened by prohibiting the transmission of any matter offensiv to modesty, or tending to subvert respect for decency and morality, first by constituting the postmaster-general the judge of the character of such matter to forbid its carriage in the mails (which could only be prevented by executiv order), and second by leaving to judicial action the duty of imposing penalties.

"It does not matter whether or not a given publication presented for mailing appears, by complaint or otherwise, to a postmaster to be 'obscene, lewd, or lascivious,' if it does appear to be 'indecent.' He is obliged, in order not to become a law-breaker, to refer the questionable point to the proper department official. It does not matter, when the referee considers the question, whether the given publication is merely 'obscene, lewd, or lascivious.' If it is simply indecent, he must exclude it or break the law."

If the Bible is a book read by 'lecherous-minded youths' for lecherous purposes, and particular passages therein are marked for the defilement of others; if it is a book used by such lecherous persons to bring confusion to young girls, or to aid in destroying their virtue; if its reading and study "produces the utmost disorder in both sexes," as this high Roman Catholic Christian organ asserts, is it a book to which Mr. Holy John can afford mail facilities without breaking the law? Is not such a book offensiv to modesty? Does it not tend to subvert respect for decency and morality? Is it not more than simply "indecent?" Is it not in fact "obscene, lewd, or lascivious?"

And yet this book is one which is not only permitted to be sent through the mails by the post-office authorities who refuse the same privilege to books against which none of these charges can be successfully maintained, but it is called "divine," the "book of books," the "word of God," a "sacred volume," a "precious treasure," the "only way to salvation," a "perfect work," etc., etc., etc. Should it not rather be excluded from the libraries of all decent people, banished from the courts, taken from the pulpits, and burnt in the yard of every schoolhouse where destroyers of innocence seek to introduce it?

We earnestly ask the authorities at Washington to ponder upon this description of the Bible by eminent Roman Catholics, and to see if it is not time that Judge Tyner's decision that the Bible is a mailable book under the statute be rescinded.

The Case of Mr. Clarence L. Swartz.

Mr. Clarence L. Swartz, editor of Lucifer when Mr. Harman was in prison, was some time ago arrested for selling the Sunday Sun. The bail demanded was at first four thousand dollars, but afterward it was reduced to one-half that sum. Mr. E. C. Walker in Liberty uses this as a text to read to the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER a little sermon. He says: "The case of Clarence L. Swartz is one that I must respectfully refer to Mr. Eugene M. Macdonald and other Secularists who think that a press censorship is not particularly dangerous unless exercised by the federal government. State and municipal meddling with the reading matter of the people, so these gentlemen hav maintained in various controversies with me, was not likely to ultimate in any serious abridgment of citizens' rights. It was the federal courts alone which constituted a grave menace to the liberty of expression, publication, and dissemination. When M. Harman, George S. Harman, and E. C. Walker were arrested in Kansas under the Comstock statute, the bail for each was fixed at five hundred dollars, which was readily furnished, and the accused parties were at once released from custody. Subsequently, continuances and postponements were granted, and the bail was not increased. Clarence L. Swartz was arrested under a state law against sensational literature, a law passed last winter by the 'Reform' (Alliance) legislature, and for weeks he lay in jail because he could not giv bail in the sum of four thousand dollars. Under state law he was required by a state court to giv a bond eight times greater than that exacted of us by the federal court under the federal law. The supreme court of the state subsequently reduced the bail to two thousand dollars, still four times greater than the one fixed by the federal court in our cases. When a mere law machine occupies the bench, does it make any particular difference to the accused what the jurisdiction of the power is which licenses said law machine to grind and crush the flesh and bones of the helpless victim?"

Now, we never said that a press censorship "is not particularly dangerous unless exercised by the federal government." We do not believe that any press censorship should be exercised. What we said was that the municipal authorities, the police courts, should deal with the vendors of that sort of literature about which there is no dispute as to its nature or purpose or effect. We said, and still say, that t here is need of some power to punish villains who print and sell such trash to children; and we said, and still say, that the federal government is not the proper power, and has not been given by the Constitution any power to exercise literary censorship over mail matter.

The character of the Sunday Sun, for acting as agent of which Mr. Swartz is in danger of imprisonment, is thus described by one of our Western correspondents: "The Kansas City Sunday Sun is a sheet devoted exclusivly to social scandal. It has a corps of local scavengers or backdoor sneaks in every town within three hundred miles of Kansas City whose office it is to rake up a weekly budget of scandal and send it to headquarters. The more false, malicious, and sensational the matter the greater the sale of papers and the bigger the harvest. What its income is from blackmail will of course never be known, but every issue contains numerous warnings which no one can understand save the persons for whom they are intended. No scale of prices for indulgences or for buying off the vampires is published, but as in the case of Comstock and Britton it will likely be adjusted to meet the necessities of the case. When the true character of this infamous publication is understood by Liberals they will giv it no sympathy or encouragement."

If this is the character of the publication for which Mr. Swartz has been arrested, we confess to no sympathy whatever with him. He has no moral right to injure other people by spreading scandal about them, and if he has done it he deserves the contempt of all decent people. He ought to be buried a mile deep under libel suits, and whether he is held to bail in four or forty thousand dollars he gets nothing more than he deserves.

Mr. Walker's argument is one tending to Anarchy, or the abolition of all government. As we do not believe such a scheme feasible or practicable we shall not follow him. It is true that all governments do injustice, but that is owing to the bigotry, dishonesty, and tyrannical nature of the human beings who administer them. Government should be restricted to the least interference with the people possible. But its interference to protect the people libeled from the libeler seems in the case of Mr. Swartz perfectly justified. By selling the paper he sought to injure his fellow-citizens, and he should be restrained.

Driven from His Country.

We printed last week from the London National Reformer an account written by himself of the many prosecutions and persecutions for blasphemy of Dr. Voelkel, editor of the Free Religious Sunday Paper at Magdeburg, Germany. His account concluded with the statement that in two cases of conviction an appeal had been taken to a higher court, with the result then in doubt. Unfortunately, this doubt exists no longer.

By a postal card dated Zurich, Switzerland, June 12th, Dr. Voelkel informs us that he has had to flee from his country. His first conviction has been affirmed, twelve months' imprisonment being the sentence. In addition, appeal on another was likely to go against him, carrying with it from twelve to eighteen months in jail. So, following the advice of friends, and no doubt consulting his own preference for personal freedom, he has left the country of the kaiser and his established church for the republic of Switzerland, where at Zurich he found other of his countrymen who had left Germany for the same cause. He has taken part of his family with him, and established a school to maintain himself. For the information of any young American Infidels who may be going abroad to study, he desires us to print this notice:

"Young foreigners who wish to attend the excellent institutes of learning in Zurich, Switzerland, will find board and private tuition at Dr. Voelkel's, No. 15 University street."

Germany is a country full of Infidels, and yet it has such elastic blasphemy laws that the mildest criticism of the church, or of Christianity, can be punished vigorously. The offenses of Dr. Voelkel, as he explained them in the article printed last week, are of the most trivial kind, and of the sort committed every day in this country and England with impunity. They resemble Abner Kneeland's "crime;" and it is a mark of the progress of his time that even in Massachusetts his heresy is almost orthodoxy now. Germany seems to be about where the Puritan commonwealth was fifty years ago. New Jersey, Delaware, and some of the Southern states are in line with Germany, but in the enlightened states Infidels can rejoice at the freedom enjoyed, compared with that of their German brethren.

The German scholars hav devoted a great deal of time to investigating the historical accuracy of the Bible, and their labors hav resulted in great good to the world, as they and their English co-workers hav furnished the evidence to effectually destroy the popular notions concerning that "sacred volume." At this distance, and under the circumstances, it seems to us that they could advantageously put in a good deal of labor with the legislators of the Empire, with a view of wiping out the blasphemy laws.

Puritan Massachusetts.

How afraid the average politician is of the fanatical religious element, and how easily he is induced to go with it—working the church racket, as he calls it—is again shown by the ease with which a clergyman got a resolution asking for the closing of the World's Fair on Sundays through the Massachusetts House of Representativs on the 11th ult. The resolution reads:

"WHEREAS Massachusetts has always been true to the Pilgrim spirit, which planted the Old Colony and laid the foundation of this grand republic;

"Therefore, in the opinion of this House, it is meet and proper that in the coming World's Columbian Exposition, in the city of Chicago, this state should make manifest to the world, in every possible manner, the prevailing sentiment of the people on the subject of the observance of the Lord's Day, as it is expressed by public statute and the practice of the inhabitants of the commonwealth."

The Illinois legislature ought to retaliate by protesting against the open Museum of Boston and the open saloons. That would reveal to the fanatical clergyman and the cowardly legislators who allowed a few votes to make the adoption of the resolution unanimous, the hight of their impudence.

We had hoped that the state of our esteemed contemporary, the Investigator, had departed from the Pilgrim spirit of whipping Quakers, hanging witches, and putting Sabbath breakers in the stocks or jails, but the hope is shattered if this resolution is allowed to stand as an expression of the people's opinions.

Editorial Notes.

THE Baptists of Spartansburg, Pa., opened their church to a Seventh Day Adventist preacher and procured one of their ministers to meet him in debate. The judges decided that the Adventist won and then the Baptists closed their church against him. It looks as though the Baptists in at least one place would lose their hitherto high reputation for "religious toleration."

MR. HARMAN has again been summoned to Leavenworth to no purpose. He was informed that Judge Caldwell was still sick at his home in Little Rock, Ark., and that he would probably not be able to attend the summer term of the United States circuit court, in Kansas, at all. This failure on the part of the judge, Mr. Harman thinks, will compel him to go to Judge Caldwell's home in Arkansas for a hearing in "vacation."

SAYS the deceiving Voice across the way: "It is a tough job to set THE TRUTH SEEKER right in all respects, but we will try to do so in one respect. If we succeed in this we shall then feel encouraged to try to convert it to religion." Before our Prohibition neighbor seriously attempts to convert us we desire to know how it dares to fly in the face of providence by being a Prohibition organ when the Lord himself has commanded that man shall bestow his money for oxen, or for strong drink, or for whatsoever his soul lusteth after.

PERSISTENCE in evil doing cannot be too sternly rebuked. Here is the Rev. John F. Ray, who has for many years been a preacher of the Disciple sect, then a Methodist minister, then back to the Disciple fold, where he contracted the drink habit, also the burglarious habit, now going to the penitentiary for two years, but announcing that he will again enter the ministry when his sentence expires. If the way of the casual transgressor is hard, what should be the path of him who continues to follow a profession which has such disastrous results?

THE Christian at Work says: "And let us say that almost within the memory of the writer Paine's 'Age of Reason' professed not only to 'co-ordinate' but to entirely supersede the Bible. The 'Age of Reason' is dead." This is nonsense. The "Age of Reason" is a criticism of the Bible, not a parallel work. None but a person entirely ignorant of its contents, or of the meaning of the word co-ordinate, could hav written that sentence. As for the "Age of Reason" being dead, it is not so. More copies are sold annually now than at any previous time. There is a constant and increasing demand for it. The editor of the Christian at Work must hav had Watson's "Apology for the Bible," a so-called "reply" to Paine, in mind.

As long as religion is permitted in our public schools there will be trouble. The latest case is a dispute over a medal in an uptown grammar school. The principal is accused of withholding the medal from a promising pupil because the pupil is a Catholic, but this is denied, and with good show of reason, for the principal announces herself an Infidel. "I don't discriminate," she says, "against pupils on account of religion, for I hav none myself. I don't bother church nor chapel." This is the neutral sort of teachers desirable, but even she cannot help being suspected by the sectarians of doing what they feel they would do were they in her place.

MR. CHARLES WATTS sailed for England on the 24th of last month for a two months' visit. He will lecture two or three times each Sunday in the larger cities and on week nights in smaller places, and perhaps some debates may take place, for over there the Christians can sometimes find a man willing to be slaughtered. The last debate Mr. Watts participated in was with Dr. Sexton, a peripatetic and guerrilla-like advocate of false history and superstition, now residing in Dunkirk, N. Y. Mr. Sexton was once a Church of England man, then joined the Freethought party of England, then became a Spiritualist, and finally went back to Christianity, though he never preaches hell, and avoids the subject of the atonement. He has very little standing in the church, but is a keen debater and master of all the rhetorical tricks to satisfy popular prejudice. Mr. Watts's friends, however, allege that the Christian wasn't in the last debate. Mr. Watts will return in September.

SOME friend has sent us a copy of the Daily Ledger, of Tacoma, Wash., containing a report of a sermon by a Rev. C. O. Brown on "W. E. Gladstone vs. Tom Paine." From the nature of the discourse we judge the speaker to be the same Brown who at Dubuque, Iowa, tried to create a sensation by slandering Infidels. Our correspondent asks concerning the sermon, "How is this for a champion liar?" and we can only say that it is pretty fair, but has been exceeded by more versatil and imaginativ preachers. There are a few lies about Paine which Mr. Brown evidently forgot. But there is little use in pricking windbags of Mr. Brown's size. If he is the man we suspect, we did it once when he lied about Colonel Ingersoll, but he never had the honesty and manliness to acknowledge that he had slandered the gentleman. Freethinkers in Tacoma who may be annoyed by Mr. Brown's flings at Paine can rest assured that his charges are entirely false, and if detailed proof is wanted it is already in print in Ingersoll's "Paine Vindicated," published at this office, price fifteen cents.

THE Presbyterian fanatics banded to inflict a puritan Sunday upon the country are much exercised over the heathenish condition of Michigan. Over a quarter of a million of people in that state, they complain, signed the anti-Sunday-law petition to Congress, among them several clergymen, and up to date there is not a single "Sabbath" association in the state, nor has there been a single "Sabbath" convention held in the state for several years. Instead of complaining, however, we congratulate Michigan on these things; and we also believe that THE TRUTH SEEKER has helped somewhat to bring them about. Our list has always been good in that state, and there are several prominent Infidels living there who hav written and spoken and worked for mental liberty and personal freedom. The Spiritualists, too, are numerous in Michigan, and their influence is on the side of liberty. So, while we may—though we do not—feel sorry that the feelings of the fanatics are hurt, we cannot but think that in disregarding the appeals of the Puritans in these things Michigan is all right.

THIS is the way the Ottawa Lever, the official Prohibition organ of Kansas, sails into THE TRUTH SEEKER: "A few days since a gentleman handed us THE TRUTH SEEKER, a journal devoted to the pulling down of Christianity and the building up of Infidelity. In a correspondence published in that journal the opening paragraph reads as follows: 'Of all the superstitions which debase and dwarf the mind of man there is none so prolific of evil as the belief in the existence of a God.' David had reference to this fellow when he said, 'The fool hath said in his heart there is no God.' But what surprised us most was an article professing to giv some statistics relating to the persons confined in the penitentiary at Leavenworth, and also of those received at the penitentiary of Pennsylvania in the year 1890. In both cases it is claimed that Christians and temperance people predominated. The object of this report is, of course, to discredit Christianity and temperance, and to enthrone Infidelity and Bacchus, and if true would be startling. But all history and all former statistics go to prove the opposition. That Christianity is counterfeited will not be denied, but such wholesale counterfeiting is not to be believed. With all due respect to the gentleman who gave us this blasphemous document, we must say that we are surprised that one of his intelligence should be captivated with such stuff, the whole trend of which is to dethrone God and righteousness, and to enthrone that which is evil and only evil and that continually. But we are glad that those who hav fully accepted Christ and hav the witness within themselvs do not hav to depend on the vaporings of Infidels whose only belief (?) is 'I don't believe.'" The careless ease with which Mr. Preshaw brushes away facts and makes accusations must win the undying gratitude of Frances Willard and others of her ilk. The Voice itself could scarcel yhav done better.

Letters from Friends.

But Hypocrisy.

BELOIT, WIS., June 12, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: You will find inclosed money order to be applied on my subscription and for the ANNUAL. I send all my TRUTH SEEKERS through the mail to friends all over the country and try to get subscribers, but cannot get any yet. Religion is simply hypocrisy in this community. I remain, Yours for liberty, NELSE CHRISTENSEN.

Bitter-Sweet.

PUEBLO, COL., June 6, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: A few days ago I saw by our city papers that R. G. Ingersoll was to be here and deliver a lecture, also De Witt Talmage. I only wish it is true. I am very anxious to hear them both. My preference of course is Ingersoll. Long liv THE TRUTH SEEKER and Watson Heston. Yours for liberty and truth, MRS. C. A. BEELETH.

A Confirmed Truth-lover.

CHEHALIS, WASH., June 4, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed I send post-office order for subscription for your entertaining and welcome paper. It appears to me that I cannot do without it while life and being endures. I am now in my seventy-fifth year, having been born in the year 1816, and consequently can remain here but a short time. N. BEEBY COFFMAN.

They Still Long to Burn.

LOS BANNOS, CAL., June 9, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I am getting subscribers for Freethought works. I hav used the "Pictorial Text-Book" as an object-lesson to many, but prudently. Several promised to send for it, but none hav done so. Some say, "I do not want to see your book. It ought to be burnt. I would not hav it in the house." So you see where ignorance is bliss it is folly to be wise. Yours in truth, WM. H. DEVOE.

One Missionary to a Whole Tribe.

EVEREST, KAN., June 8, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I like your TRUTH SEEKER very much. I am a Moravian, and my friends despise me. But that does not hurt me any. I showed your TRUTH SEEKER to some of the Moravians, but it made their hair stand on their heads when they saw the picture. They are afraid of the truth, so it makes them shudder to see it. For we Moravians are all Roman Catholic. And as your picture clips the hair to the skin it is intolerable to them. And I wish you to send me one of your TRUTH SEEKERS of March 14th, with the picture with that Almighty Dollar. V. M.

MONTPELIER, IND., June 11, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been lately awakened to the benefit of free public schools. My granddaughter took a subscription school, the style of fifty years ago, and it works just as it did then. Just as soon as the subscription expires the scholars leave school. Thus the school is gradually dwindling. Experience proves that the children will not be educated except by the free public school system, and many children would be benefited by making attendance compulsory. Free the schools from the teachings of superstition, whether Christian or otherwise, and compel attendance by such as are eligible to attend, even if they hav to be clothed at public expense to enable them to attend. WM. ALLEN.

On Glory-Seekers.

PITTSBURGH, PA., June 13, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I as a constant reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER think it my duty to write a few lines concerning the tender-hearted glory-seekers. Oh, may the time be hastened when men and women will hav the curtain drawn from before their eyes that they might see the light of the world and the darkness they hav been led into. It is a shame and outrage that people will allow themselvs to be overpowered by a lot of hypocrits and robbers. I hav witnessed with my own eyes families depriving themselvs of something to eat to try and benefit the church. They hav gone as far as to borrow money from their neighbors to giv to the priests for fear they would lose their seat in glory. May the time hasten when this robbery shall cease and the people shall come to their senses. Very truly, ADAM RITCHIE.

HARMONY, IND., June 2, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I am seventy-five years old; I hav but little of this world's goods, but as long as I can raise a dollar I must hav the grand old TRUTH SEEKER.

When the Gods made that mythical Adam and took the rib to make the woman, did they take a rib out of a horse to make a mare? How did they get a rib out of an oyster, a leech, or a snail? Bah!

Would people know how to swear if it was not for the Bible? There are all the oaths that they use, in that holy nuisance.

I hav been trying to get a subscriber, but there are two churches, and between these and want of independence I hav failed. At least three-fourths of the church-goers are women. I am going to make another effort.

Stir up the elephant, Brother Heston. I hav had several laughs at 'Lish trying to swallow that big loaf of bread.

Yours for knowledge and mental liberty,

JESSE MAURER.

From an Exposed Outpost.

WALNUT GROVE, KAN., June 5, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: THE TRUTH SEEKER is the only paper that I appreciate. I like it for its outspoken and bold defense of humanity and opposition to the false teachings of theology and the self-called and self-appointed priests, preachers, and false teachers. I liv in a community of God's chosen children, some of which are advanced to perfection and hav received sanctification. So you perceive that I hav to stand out against the combined forces of perfect superstition, ignorance, and hatred of everything that is not labeled Christ, and has not the church leader's stamp affixed, in default of which you receive their righteous Christian boycott. Now you know why I cannot get subscribers for one of the best papers in America. But they hav to stand a little lecture on Liberal Freethought occasionally. The Methodists got up a dress-parade some time ago, but it was a flat failure. They did not even get one of the backsliders warmed over. And then the Wesleyans tried their hand at a revival, and they did get to warm over a few children and women. But it took the whole outfit two months to get a half dozen converts to the faith. They hav poor preaching and poor pay. I remain, Yours truly, W. H. NOAH.

Threw Bombs.

EMMETSBURG, IA., May 26, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Mr. Charles Watts gave us a great lecture here on the evening of the 22d. This was the first Freethought lecture ever delivered in this town or county. His subject was, "Christianity or Secularism, Which is the Better for Mankind?" Before he came, we had never seen him, and were afraid we could not get over twenty-five or thirty to go out to hear the lecture. But happily we were surprised; when the lecture was called, there were about three hundred in the room, and their attention was held throughout the entire lecture. In his opening Mr. Watts invited anyone and at any time to ask any questions he or she desired, but no questions materialized. Watts is truly great on this subject, and being honest in his views, straightforward in his logic and reason, with his manly appearance, he takes and holds an audience every time. I am confident that could he hav remained another night our Opera House would hav been crowded to the utmost. He threw several bombs in the orthodox camp of this place that will keep them talking if not thinking for several days. Why, do you believe it, the Democrat, a paper published here, and edited by a Roman Catholic, gave three columns of the paper in attempting to refute the arguments of Mr. Watts, and warning the people, especially the young, against Secularism. But the article reads flat enough to fry on a griddle.

Brother Watts, come again, and come loaded with "hot shot," is the wish of myself and many others.

Yours for mankind, C. E. COHOON.

IPAVA, ILL., May 25, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $10, for which be kind enough to send the grand old TRUTH SEEKER to the hereinnamed persons. The more I read THE TRUTH SEEKER the more thoroughly I become convinced that we are on the right track to preserve our liberty, and "eternal vigilance is the price of liberty." The gentlemen named above are reading and thinking men. They know the price of our liberty. They believe it was too dearly bought to be thoughtlessly given up.

There is much being said about the World's Fair and there should be more said. For the sake of humanity, morality, and common decency let the great Fair be open on Sunday. There is one thing noticeable to a close observer, namely, the churches, the gambling-holes, the saloons, and houses of ill fame are all for closing the Fair on Sunday. I believe John the Revelator said something about "Babylon the great" being "the mother of harlots." All readers know what is meant by Babylon.

Awake, put on the armor of vigilance, and free thy mind from blighting and damnable deception that must sooner or later ruin our nation and blight every moral sentiment of our being. King George was a very devout Christian; history tells us how good he was, and by reading history we can readily see why our forefathers left God out of the Constitution. Yours very truly, THOMAS B. DUNCAN.

Who Dare Forbid Investigation?

NORTH YAKIMA, WASH., May 30, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: The hard times you speak of seem to be universal in our county. I hav been trying to get some new subscribers to your paper, and I find many who like the paper but cannot afford to subscribe owing to the hard times, but promised they would as soon as they could spare the money. I think, if hard times oppress THE TRUTH SEEKER you might suspend all, or a part, of the pictures. As for me, I like to see them continued as long as the paper continues, but if the expense does not justify the income, I would say, dispense with any part of the paper that is the least necessary.

I see that my communication March 21st on Spiritualism, which was also a severe and just criticism at the Brotherhood of Moralists, was a shot that hit them so hard that it made some of them flinch. They deny that their constitution forbids investigation in anything. The article that I criticised was in one of the original copies of their constitution adopted when they first organized, which was just as I stated. It may be that so much criticism has induced them to revise their constitution. If so, I do not know it. I hav not had time yet to reply to any of the unphilosophical criticism of my investigations of these phenomena called Spiritualism. It may be that before I can get a final decision, I shall hav to refer this matter to Mr. Salter. Before I get through I shall put Mr. Salter on the witness-stand, and if he will bear a thorough cross-examination, and I find that he can explain his own theory so well that I will feel safe in trusting him to lay down a theory for me, I will say, well done; but at present I think he needs our prayers.

The Man Guilty, Not the Drink.

LEAVENWORTH, KAN., June 14, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I see I am quoted as once saying that "every glass of liquor contains murder." I deny the soft impeachment. I never said it. Black as a crow and three black crows are quite different.

During the campaign here for the prohibitory amendment I advocated with tongue and pen the plan of separating vinous and fermented liquors from distilled and exempting them from the proposed law. For argument's sake I was willing to grant all that the fanatics claimed about "drink" leading to crime and pauperism (though believing the reverse to be nearer the truth), but I argued that the innocent should not be condemned with the guilty. Do not, said I, punish mild drinks for the crimes committed by "strong drinks." Do not kill poor Tray because he is found in bad company. I plead with the Prohibition mob for reason, justice, and temperance, but you might as well talk to a howling horde of escaped lunatics.

A glass of whisky, even, can no more commit murder than can a carving knife, a gun, an ax, or a club. Its character or nature is no more immoral than that of a loaf of bread. The strength it imparts can be used for good or bad. That alcohol has been made a universal scapegoat for crime every honest and intelligent person will admit. Drink always does it. The poor innocent cherub never had a mean thought in his heart until drink put it there. Drink instigated the crime and impelled him to its commission against his will. Drink did it all. Bah! Such rot would make a "Liberal" dog vomit. In proportion to its ability to giv power to effort or force and speed to direction there is just as much murder in a beefsteak as there is in a glass of whisky. Strong drink's power for moral good is precisely equal to its power for evil. Is anyone so obtuse as not to understand my position now? S. R. SHEPHERD.

A Contamination.

SENOIA, GA., June 6, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I will send an order for books in the near future. I often write for our local paper, but sometimes an inspired article like this falls in the waste-basket. Senoia is one of the most pious towns in Georgia. The women and children attend church and Sunday-school, while the men read THE TRUTH SEEKER on the sly.

Yes, they read it on the sly,
And whenever caught they lie—
But we'll get them by and by.

Last month the pupils of the Baptist school here gave a May-day entertainment at night, in which the crowning of the Queen of May was rather an imposing feature, more especially to a radical Infidel. However, things passed off nicely until one of the sweet little imps of paradise placed a Bible at the feet of the Queen. After this savage act your scribe retired in disgust. When will intelligent people quit flinging that dirty old book in the faces of decent people? After we retired an old Agnostic asked me to write up that little drama. And this is what I wrote. But it was rejected for want of space—bah!

An eccentric old gentleman residing on Aurum current, who has well-defined symptoms of hypochondriasis, was advised by his physician to visit Senoia and witness the exercises of the Excelsior Academy. When the curtain, decked with classic scenes, began to roll like purple clouds with golden fringe to high tragic realms, a wave of music soft and sweet came like an Ingersollian dream and touched the anvil in his ear, and lo! the calm hypnotic state. While thus bewitched he saw the muses come and go beneath the chandelier. He watched the fairies promenade the jewel-paved parks of paradise. He saw and heard lovely lassies laugh where lovely lilacs line languorous lanes. He saw them crown the Queen of May, a lovely girl, and place a Bible at her feet. He saw around that sacred volume glow circularly the intangible apparitions of Ruth and Tamor, moral guides, in ethical converse low and sweet with all the virtuous daughters fair of righteous Lot. He saw damsels fair of modern mold whirl floral hoops with high angelic grace. And yet he kept serene. But when he saw the old doctor in the last play extract a black cat from that boy's stomach he was instantly seized with a paroxysm. When reaction set in the old gentleman gave a prehistoric smile and said: "This world is one of the most wonderful enigmas that ever evolved from the kaleidoscopic laboratory of Agnostic phenomena."

Long life to THE TRUTH SEEKER. Three cheers for Heston.

R. M. TENCH, M.D.

Quarrelsome Brethren.

INDUSTRY, KAN., June 15, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I am many times indeed obliged to you for your kindness in helping me out in the argument with the preacher on total depravity. As yet I hav not seen him to present the facts, as I hav been kept very busy for some time working.

Really, I do not know how to express myself to you and Brother Heston for the grand and noble work you are doing for Universal Mental Liberty. I do hope—yes, and pray—that every man, woman, and child that loves truth, reason, and common sense will stand manfully and courageously by you and all others that are working for the upholding of truth and all that is noble and refining.

I am doing all I can according to my means and ability to help our cause along. My Liberal papers and books are all the time on the go, doing missionary work, and I find it is bearing good fruit for Universal Mental Liberty.

I will tell you an amusing anecdote. Last Sunday evening I went to church in our little village, and after the preacher got through with his sermon he suggested the great importance of organizing a Union Sunday-school. He said he would much rather hav a church Sunday-school (that is, of his denomination), but as that could not be, he proposed a Union Sunday-school, and went on to tell how important it was to hav it, etc. And after he was through, Brother Kirby, of the Presbyterian church, jumps up and says, "We hav a Union Sunday-school at the church." Then Preacher Solt remarked as much as to say it did not make any difference what they had at the church, we would organize for a Union Sunday-school. The truth of the matter is, this little village has only one church building, and the understanding was at the time they were raising money to build it, that all denominations could use it to preach in. But a few years after it was built the Presbyterians chased the other denominations out, and took possession of it, and by them quarreling with other denominations not only broke up their own sect, but also the rest. And this man, Rev. Mr. Solt, came here a few weeks ago to preach in the hall, as they would not allow him (that is, the Presbyterians) to preach in the church; and Brother Presbyterian Kirby and his outfit are determined to defeat all other sects and break them up if they possibly can. And this other outfit says, they are going to hav preaching and a Union Sunday-school in the hall, if they hav to stand at the door with shot-guns to keep the other sect or outfit from coming in and breaking up their sect and Sunday-school. Brother Kirby and his small outfit are very mad indeed, because nobody else will come to his church and Sunday-school; and in order to hav revenge he is doing all he can to stop other sects from coming in or doing anything. So you see how the brethren love one another. When Rev. Mr. Solt told Brother Kirby he did not care what they had in the church, he had the first right to the hall, and was going to preach and hav a Union Sunday-school, the whole congregation smiled and applauded, and on the way going home, I heard some remark that it was the best joke they had heard for many a day.

J. B. Wise.

Exemption in Noise, as in All.

Cathlamet, Wash., May 24, 1891.

Mr. Editor: Property-holders in many parts of the growing West who care no more for churches than they do for Chinamen assist in building and running God-houses merely to boom their real estate or business interests. Even Cathlamet, which thus far has prospered without a gospel-crib, proposes soon to build one; certain people deeming that a town is incomplete without a church. If a Liberal opposes the church racket as a boom to real estate he is not only accused of being blind to business interests, but charged with being illiberal in not wishing all sides on the religious question duly represented by a house. There are several good farms valued from $1,200 to $3,000 near Cathlamet that will probably soon be sold. The writer sincerely hopes that Liberals may grasp these opportunities. There is no reason why the banks of the Columbia river in the near future should not be as thickly settled as those of the Hudson. The soil is fertil, rain plentiful, and the climate as mild as that of Virginia.

The Sanitary Era of April contains an editorial entitled, "Wholesale Murder by Noise," protesting against the racket made by steam whistles, elevated railroads, Fourth of July celebrations, wakes, etc., in our large cities. It suggests that the mortality statistics of July 4th and January 1st in the morning be compared with those of other days in the year. No mention is made of church bells on Sunday morning. Roosevelt Hospital it is reported has brought suit against the elevated railroad for damages to the hospital done by the noise of the trains. Will some one please inform us concerning a suit brought against a Christian church whose brazen tongue has snapped the slender thread of life of the invalid in an adjoining house? But the other tongue that wags beneath the brazen tongue proves not infrequently disastrous to the health of those that listen to its words. I could furnish ample proof of this in cases that hav come under my observation. I will relate one merely because it is the latest, thus the freshest in my memory. A woman informs me that she fears she will become insane. Her husband expresses like fears concerning her. She thinks upon religion and prays continually while alone. She has an overpowering conviction that she offends God. Some years ago a preacher told her that she should try to pray as though she was speaking face to face with God. She obeyed him, and now the habit has got the best of her, and she is on the border-land of insanity. Cases like these in our asylums are treated with the dance and comic drama, these being the recognized antidotes to the solemn poison of religious faith. Outside the asylums in sane society we may thank the comedian and the actor for saving many a mental life that the preacher would destroy. Howbeit, the poor lazy hirelings dispensing their dementalizing virus know not what they do. What Liberal has not seen a devoted believer in the Bible dogmas flee from his company at the utterance of a few words questioning his belief? How many copies of The Truth Seeker hav Christians torn up in their anger and flung to the flames—wishing perhaps that the writers could be thrown into the flames or torn to pieces as easily? A state of mind like this if continuous would be declared insane. A Christian said to me: "I love my religion. It pains me to hear it questioned." And the face of the speaker showed that the words were sincere. But the words of the questioner rang in the mind of the believer and therein a battle raged 'twixt faith and reason. The believer strove to pluck out reason from the brain, that faith might reign supreme. Every mental effort to the end of plucking out reason to giv faith dominion is one step nearer to insanity; but such battles generally do not wage long, for some one laughs, the forces of faith forget themselvs in the hubbub of mirth, and reason amuses herself as best she can within her little cage.

Truth Will Make Life Worth Living.

Martinsburg, W. Va., June 18, 1891.

Mr. Editor: In the great conflict between Christianity and science the preponderance of the evidence is largely on the side of skepticism and unbelief, and the great cause of truth and justice is advancing though against overwhelming odds. The Christian influence is vast and powerful, and considering this fact Freethought is gaining ground wonderfully. Influence, wealth, and numbers do not necessarily nor at all prove that it represents the truth. The power of might and not of right has made the sad, deplorable condition of things that humanity is suffering from. In all countries where church and state are allied society to-day is full of injustice and rotten to the core, and the poor struggling slaves of tyranny and toil are too ignorant and blind to perceive who and what agencies is and are responsible for the almost universal injustice that prevails so much in the world. As to religious belief, it is clear to my judgment that people hav no choice in choosing what they believe or may not believe.

Naturally the human race is doomed to perish, even living under the best state of justice and liberty. At last death overtakes all. Considering all things in this life, it is getting to be surely an open question, and very rational, to think and say, "Is life worth the living?" As the love of life is so intense amid even its sufferings and drawbacks, the great majority seems to giv the answer in the affirmativ.

This answer is not universal, however. Occasionally a suicide is recorded here and there. In some cases the real cause was not and could not be known, but the real cause must hav been so terrible and overwhelming that the victim was justified in seeking that one and only way of eternal peace from life's fearful burdens. Insanity impels them to suicide. As to the ones who take their own life, say most people, it seems to be more of desperation than insanity. It is the sad result of many causes.

However long or short may be our life, there is but one condition for happiness and improvement in our individual lives, and that is to be devotees of the greatest of all creeds, the universal array of facts that comprises truth, which is discovered by the sum total of all experience. Knowledge and wisdom is our only savior, and it is only through this that life will be worth the living at all. Ignorance and cowardice will perpetuate the superstitions of church and state. Intelligence and nobility of heart and mind are the only things I can praise. And what a glorious blessing skepticism is to those who are capable and brave enough to sleep on the pillow of doubt. I for one can no longer be led as the innocent lamb to the slaughter. I am watching the shams, hypocrisy, and phariseeism so largely prevailing in the churches of all denominations and in so-called civilized society that is so hostil to individual liberty. I hav given an impartial hearing to Christian claims and my firm conviction is that millions of persons will be badly humbugged. Christians and nominal believers are blinded by faith. Though I hav respect for a sincere practical Christian, I hav none for the hypocrits and inconsistent believers who try to hoodwink Freethinkers. But it is only the unwary and unsuspecting who are deceived. Believers in the Christian teaching say unbelief is good enough to liv by but not to die by. What nonsense and injustice to a great God, if he exists as represented by the gospel. Why, even man could not be long deceived by such dealings. The inconsistency and disloyalty of millions of professed Christians would appear. As if they could hoodwink a great God they profess to love and serve! The actual fact is that those people make large claims about the hereafter, for they know it all. There is no going behind the returns after Rev. Dr. Talmage has his say. They believe, or pretend to believe, in the existence of a personal God of love and mercy, and a personal devil of hate. What do they do, as their life records show? Serve the devil with their best efforts and days of their life, and when death overwhelms them repentance is first in order. The question is, "What is the motiv of repentance at death's door?" It is not probably actual sincerity and sorrow for bad words and actions of their life record, nor the love of God at the eleventh hour is not probable. I hav no faith in alleged repentance at death, and the motiv of those who change their life at death is fear of hell. It is positivly a dishonest and unjust proposition. All that liv and grow up to be men and women make their own record deliberately, and I take no stock in those death-bed repentances. It is a delusion and a snare, and an insult to a great God if he exists. It is true that Freethinkers are the most honest, consistent people on earth. They profess nothing but love of the truth, and are willing to meet any judgment that may exist, on their individual merits. Life's record cannot be erased, and no genuin Freethinker will, when he or she comes to die, deliberately go back on their life convictions, surrender to superstition, and thus please its devotees. And any so-called unbeliever who may do so never has been a Freethinker in any sense of the word. If so disposed, Freethinkers ought to, when death approaches, invite gospel believers to attest to the truth that the genuin Freethinker carries his life's conviction to the grave. As the long-looked-for savior cannot be found in the daytime of life, neither is he found in the night of oblivion.

Thomas J. Conners.

A Social Experimeut.

La Logia, Sinaloa, Mex., May 24, e.m. 291.

Mr. Editor: During the last month I hav received numerous inquiries about this country and our people, all of which I wish to answer through your valuable paper. There are some over four hundred people here now. A party of fifty-eight arrived here last week from Kansas, and we expect another party of about thirty in a week or two. All the people here except two or three reject God, Christ, and the Bible. We are one big stock company. Every adult is a stockholder. We hav near two hundred thousand acres of the loveliest land I ever saw, with a hill eight hundred feet high in the center. I can only liken it to putting a teacup in the center of a large table and then putting a sheet of paper under one leg to represent the land sloping toward the coast with a fall of two feet to the mile. We are at present camped here on the Fuseta river about twenty-five or thirty miles from the mouth. Our land begins four miles from the river. It is fifteen miles out to the hill I speak of. From its top we see Topolobampo bay, eighteen miles away, where the boat landing is and where some of our people liv. The ditch I spoke of in my former letter is about one-half completed, and will cost, I think now, one hundred and fifty thousand dollars, and will be completed about the 1st of December, when we will all or nearly all move to this large tract of land. The farm at La Logia is only a temporary stopping-place. The houses here are made out of poles and mats, and are only temporary concerns, but the people are very comfortable in them. When the people move on the large tract of land there will be some fine houses built. There is no water to be got by digging wells on any of this land at present. It is calculated to supply everything with the water from the ditch. There is no one living on any of this land. It is all wild, with herds of cattle and horses roaming over it winter and summer. I came here last December. Corn was in roasting ear, and we hav green corn in camp now. We hav had strawberries for the last six months, or nearly so. They are not gone yet. We expect two thousand people here next fall as soon as the ditch is finished. No church can ever be built here. I regard this as a very healthy country. I visited the hospital the other day. There were three sick, all doing well; and sick were never better cared for. Two died recently with typhoid fever. They were both as fine men as ever I met with—Freethinkers, and not afraid to go.

I started with pack and gun the first of this month to find, if I could, the mouth of this river and hunt alligators. I found the mouth at the end of four days; saw one hundred and eighty alligators, and killed twenty-two. I dug lots of clams along the coast, and caught crabs and shot game and gathered shells to my heart's content.

I am still delighted with the climate and people, but would advise all Freethinkers before coming here to read O. K. Owen's book on "Integral Coöperation" and not to come unless they approve of the plan. We are a company. We elect our officers and operate as any other stock company. We will begin our first railroad soon. Men that come down with me many of them put in about one tenth or twentieth of what they had. Now they are putting in every dollar they can get, because they like the people, the climate, and the business methods. Woman has the same privileges that men hav. Under our system there can be no interest, rent, or taxes; no paupers, and, I think, no criminals. Grog is cheap here, but there are no drunken people or immoral people. A couple were married by contract not long ago. It caused some little comment in camp, but all, so far as I could learn, believed them truly sincere, and all comment has ceased. If there are any Freethinkers who want to come here they must first make a statement in regard to age, occupation, etc.; get permit from O. K. Owen; take one share in the land fund at $10, one share in the improvement fund at $10, and one share of Credit Foncier stock at $10. They are guaranteed work every day at remunerativ wages. Now, does the company fulfill their contract? I will giv the exact figures in my own case, as taken from the book before me. I got here the 23d of December. I hav worked one hundred and fifteen days at $3 per day. My grub has cost $8 per month, raw material; cooking, $8.20; washing, $1.15. I hav drawn $250 and hav some yet due me. But this is not real money, but scrip issued by the company. It is worth fifty cents on the dollar in American money, or sixty in Mexican. I exchanged some last evening. It is believed that this scrip will be worth dollar for dollar in American money as soon as the ditch is finished. Women get the same wages as men. We only work eight hours a day. Everybody seems happy and contented. I write what seems to be the facts at the time of writing. My last article should hav read one hundred and ten horses instead of two hundred and ten, otherwise correct. Most of the letters I received from parties inquiring I hav given to Alvin J. Wilber, manager in charge here; he will answer and send circulars to them.

There has only been one little shower of rain since I came. They tell me the rainy season begins the 1st of July.

I attended a religious festival among the Mexicans the other night. There were about fifteen hundred Mexicans and Indians, and about forty methods of gambling. One fellow had a blanket with the Father, Son, and Ghost inside a ring, with the picture of holy saints all around. Then they shook dice. Some bet on their favorit saint, some on God, and some on Christ. God is no slouch, for he came out best so far as I could see. The winner got some little piece of jewelry. Their fire-works were splendid. They sent sky-rockets five hundred feet and back on a rope. A company of devouts brought Jesus down to see the fire-works. He was fixed on a block 4x1½ feet made by taking some of the lead out of a tea chest and tacking it to the board with mescal fiber under it to make the face plump. He had ears of red flannel and the lips the same, glass marbles for eyes, and wore an embroidered blanket. The ladies made him bow very nicely when the rockets went off, then they fell on their knees, crossed themselvs, mumbled some prayers, and then put Jesus away in a box which was used for a gambling-table until the next day noon. The priests and state make a little out of such affairs.

I get the paper all right and enjoy its contents.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fal River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Bessie's Good-Bye.

"Good-bye, mamma," the little one had said,
Yet stooped a moment ere she went to play,
Her kitten to caress, 'hen turned away;
But at the door she paused and thrust her head
Just through the aperture again and said,
"Good-bye, mamma," then, tripping through the hall,
She took the tiny chaise which held her doll,
And started for a walk, but at the gate
Looked back to say once more, "Mamma, good-bye."
The mother twice had given a mild reply;
But, busily at work, her hurry great,
She said at last, with emphasis undue,
"Good-bye, good-bye, now run away, child, do!"
Nor thought again about the little one,
Till falling shades announced the set of sun;
Then to the gate she ran, and up and down
The street she glanced with eagerness, but saw Nowhere the child whom she was searching for.
Where can she be? she said with anxious frown,
As with uncovered head she hurried out,
But could not find the little girl about
The neighborhood where she was wont to play.
So, hurrying on, the anxious mother went
Along the path which to the river bent;
And there the tiny footprints told the way
The missing child had strayed, and farther on
The doll chaise, overturned, lay close upon
The river's brink—there too, the mother found
Her darling's hat and both her tiny shoes,
And 'neath the hat, as if she feared to lose
It, the doll's apparel on the ground.
A quick foreboding thrilled the mother's heart,
And all too well the awful truth she felt—
To bathe her doll Bessie had doubtless knelt
And fallen in—how like a piercing dart
The memory then of those three last good-bye's.
And when the neighbor's search restored the form
Dripping and cold, so late buoyant and warm,
The mother, in her grief, too deep for cries,
Stood by in mute despair, while reverently
Kind friends arrayed it for its resting-place;
And, at the last sad rites, 'twas only grace
Enabled her to bear them patiently.
Yet now her sweetest memory of the child
Lingers around those innocent farewells.
But, ah! one sad regret her bosom swells,
Because her last reply was not more mild.

Children Answer What Puzzles Older Heads.

There were seated in the home circle six children. Five of them were between the ages of thirteen and twenty-two. They were all kind, considerate, and well cultured. The older ones had all been out in contact with the world, and as it had met or repulsed them they were formed by its uses, fashioned by its demands. The sixth child was three years old, the pet and pride of all, and was called "Little Bunch." Mr. Stone had asked the following question: "Why does your mother love you all?" each to answer individually as to what inspired their mother's love. The oldest, a promising graduate of high scholarly attainments, thought it was his good conduct and attainments; the next son thought it was the interest he took in looking after and keeping up the affairs of home. He was precision and exactness in everything, neat to a fault. The third boy thought it was for his sprightly and funny ways of making mirth and merriment—he could always add the funny or ridiculous side to whatever occurred and no one was dull in his presence. The eldest daughter thought it was her rare ability in household affairs. In the cuisine she took great interest, and not only mother but all had come to be proud of her success in this line. The other miss thought of her sweet voice in song, of her growing rare taste for art and ideal. But dear Little Bunch, hers was the only true answer; she said: "I tink, mamma, I tink it is taus I love ou!" Yes, dear Little Bunch gave it so simply, so sweetly, that they all discerned the difference between love and admiration. Seven hearts throbbed intensely; seven older heads were answered where five had just failed. Little Bunch was the center of attraction, the mother the light. Father said truly, "The best is the greatest," and at this remark every eye met his and in each sparkled a tear. In those tears were born new and deeper loves, truer conceptions of duty. Yes, Little Bunch had transformed shadows to real, living, throbbing hearts. Yes, she separated the gold from the dross. UNCLE JACK.

Biographical Sketches of Ancient and Modern Poets.

1.—CHAUCER.

Geoffrey Chaucer was born about the year 1340. Some claim that it was in the year of 1328, but the more popular date is 1340. He was the son of John Chaucer, a London vintner, which means a dealer in wines and liquors. Geoffrey Chaucer was the first English poet that I hav any knowledge of. His poems are rather difficult to read because of the queer and old-fashioned writing.

For example:

There sate I downe among the faire flowers
And saw the birds trip out of thir bowrs,
Thare as thay rested them all the night,
Thay seemed so joyful of the dayes light,
Thay began of May for to done honours.

Still, that is not so hard as some of his other poems, but I like it the best. He in another poem givs a rather humorous yet forcible description of a woman who lost five husbands:

Bold was hire face, and fayre and red of hew.
She was a worthy woman all hire live;
Housbondes at the chirche door had she five,
With outen other compagnie in youthe.

I hav quoted the above merely to show you the turn of sentiment and the language of "ye olden time."

Chaucer married a very estimable lady, named Philippa, who was the youngest daughter of Sir Payne Roet. His wife's sister Katherine was the wife of the duke of Lancaster. It was undoubtedly these high connections that caused Chaucer's advance in life. For he became afterward known as the "Master of Science," theology, etc. He had a pleasing and entertaining way with him that made him popular with the court ladies and the royal personage. His wife died in 1387. Where "the father of English poetry" really spent his last days, cannot be ascertained. But a great many think that his last residence was at London, where he composed "The Canterbury Tales," that wonderful poem, so full of humor, pathos, and such a vivid portrayal of English life. He died in his seventy-fourth year, 1400, and was buried at Westminster Abbey, the first of that long line of poets for which the great cemetery is noted.

I will giv you a short list of some of his most popular poems. They are: "The Court of Love," "The Book of Troillus and Cresseide," "The House of Fame," "The Canterbury Tales," "The Legend of Good Women," and "The Book of the Duchess." But you may take my word for it, "The Court of Love" is best. IDA A. BALLOU.

Noble Unselfishness.

On Sunday, Dec. 27, 1885, one of the American line of steamers, the Lord Gough, while on its way from Liverpool to Philadelphia, sighted a Gloucester fishing-schooner in distress. The wind was blowing a gale, and the schooner, almost disabled, and with three or four of her crew already washed into the ocean, was flying the signal for help.

Captain Hughes of the steamship saw the fearful peril which a rescuing party must encounter, but his call for a volunteer was promptly answered by the mate and a crew of brave men, and preparations were made for the desperate trip. To the astonishment of all, while the boat was being lowered, the flag of distress on the schooner's mast was hauled down.

Perplexed at this movement, the hardy rescuers hesitated; but it was finally decided that the boat should go. With great difficulty the schooner was reached, and on her deck were found twelve men utterly without hope except from outside aid. It was necessary to make two trips, and the bold sailors of the Lord Gough took half the suffering men and toiled through the wild waters to their own ship, and returned as soon as possible for the others.

When all were safe on the steamer Captain Hughes asked the schooner's master, Capt. George W. Pendleton, why he had lowered the distress flag. The reply was:

"We saw that you were preparing to make an effort to save us, but we saw, also, that it was a sea in which it was very doubtful whether a boat would liv. I said then to my men: 'Shall we let these brave fellows risk their lives to save ours?' and they answered 'No!' Then I hauled down the flag."

The story is a noble one on both sides. The men on the schooner were worth saving, at all hazard; and the men on the steamer were worthy to save them.—Cincinnati Inquirer.

A Sensible Resurrection.

A short time ago John Gruell gave a little boy on the West Side a young opossum and told him it would make a nice pet. It was almost as white as snow and the little boy was very proud of it and named it "Bunco." Now, the boy had never seen a white opossum before and knew nothing of its nature. He played with it constantly, built it a nice little house, and fed it on all the good things he could get. But last Saturday evening, while he was playing with it and petting it he happened to hit it a little too hard, and it keeled over apparently dead. He turned it over and over again, but Bunco was as limp as a rag, and thinking it was dead sure enough, the little boy proceeded to dig a grave and bury it. A spot was selected for this purpose in the back yard, and Bunco was interred with appropriate ceremonies. The little boy was very much grieved over his loss, and slept but little all that night. He arose early Sunday morning and went out to the grave, expecting to shed a few silent tears over his pet, but imagin his surprise and astonishment to find Bunco sitting on top of the grave with its mouth wide open. At first the boy was badly frightened and hardly knew whether to laugh or cry, but seeing the laughing opossum looking him straight in the eyes, he concluded that it had risen from the grave. The little animal had become sullen the evening before, and the boy, not knowing its nature, supposed it was dead and buried it. During the night it had "come to itself," burrowed out of the grave, and was ready to play with its master again.

Correspondence.

HAMILTON, BERMUDA, June 11, 1891.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I hav written once before to the Corner, and will write about Hamilton as much as I know of it. It is the capital of Bermuda. It is very small. It would take you about half of an hour to walk in every street. There are eight streets altogether, but each not very long. There is one park in Hamilton, but it is only about one-half square acre long.

Yours truly, MARTIN E. STECKER.

BALLSTON SPA, N. Y., June 21, E. M. 291.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I now take the pleasure of writing a few more lines to the Corner. I will say my sister Sadie was married on the 10th day of this month (June). We had a splendid time. There were no parsons, Gods, ghosts, or devils present to attend or dictate her further life. She was married by Mr. Person, the justice of peace, who came to the house to marry them. Mr. Bartlett, her husband, is of this place and is a Liberal-minded young man. They are just a lovely couple. She also was the recipient of many beautiful presents, and it was what you would call an up-and-up Liberal wedding. They had a great many congratulations from their many friends. Well, fearing I am taking up too much of your valuable time, I will close.

Your true friend, HATTIE J. THORPE.

[We congratulate our friend Sadie on her newly formed ties. May our Liberal-minded friend and her husband be as happy as we wish them to be throughout all the years that may come to them. We trust Sadie will not forget the Corner, now that she has become a young married lady.—ED. C. C.]

CUSTER, ILL., June 6, 1891.

MISS SUSAN H. WIXON: I thought I would write once more. I see the Corner is not filled out as it should be. We are having cool weather here now. It has been so warm; now it is going to be cold. It rained last night. It was warm enough Decoration day to wear white dresses. I and my sister went over to the Oak Hill cemetery in the band-wagon. My brother is in the band; he beats the tenor drum. There are fourteen band-boys. Dr. Hammer, of this vicinity, is their teacher. I wish he would get up a band of girls.

I will be glad when school begins again, for I love to go to school, and I love my teacher, too. It is the same teacher that taught here last term. I received a Freethinker's Magazine, and I like it very much. I received a letter from California; a girl saw my letter in THE TRUTH SEEKER and answered it.

I hav not been outside of the state, old as I am. My papa was born in Harper's Ferry, Va., on the Potomac river. I cannot think of anything more to write. I will send you the piece that I spoke the last day of school. If you like, please publish in THE TRUTH SEEKER Children's Corner.

Very truly, MARY D. ROBINSON.

BRAVE KATE SHELLEY.

Through the whirl of wind and water
Parted by the rushing steel
Flashed the white glare of the headlight,
Flew the swift-revolving wheel,
As the midnight train swept onward,
Bearing on its iron wings
Through the gloom of night and tempest
Freightage of most precious things,
Little children by their mothers
Nestle in unbroken rest,
Stalwart men are dreaming softly
Of their journey's finished quest,
While the men who watch and guard them
Sleepless stand at post and brake;
Close the throttle! draw the lever!
Safe for wife's and sweetheart's sake.

Sleep and dream, unheeding danger;
In the valley yonder lies
Death's debris in weird confusion,
Altar fit for sacrifice!
Dark and grim the shadows settle
Where the hidden perils wait;
Swift the train, with dear lives laden,
Rushes to its deadly fate.
Still they sleep and dream unheeding.
O thou watchful one above,
Save thy people in this hour!
Save the ransomed of thy love!
Send an angel from thy heaven
Who shall calm the troubled air,
And reveal the powers of evil
Hidden in the darkness there.

Saved! ere yet they know their peril,
Comes a warning to alarm;
Saved! the precious train is resting
On the brink of deadly harm.
God has sent his angel to them,
Brave Kate Shelley, hero-child,
Struggling on, alone, unaided,
Through that night of tempest wild.
Brave Kate Shelley! tender maiden,
Baby hands with splinters torn,
Saved the lives of sleeping travelers
Swiftly to death's journey borne.
Mothers wept and clasped their darlings,
Breathing words of grateful prayer;
Men with faces blanched and tearful
Thanked God for Kate Shelley there.
Greater love than this hath no man.
When the heavens shall unfold,
And the judgment-books are opened,
There in characters of gold
Brave Kate Shelley's name shall center,
'Mid the pure, the brave, and good,
That of one who crowned with glory
Her heroic womanhood.

How to Make Money.

DEAR SIR:—Having read Mr. Sargents' experience in plating with gold, silver and nickel, I am tempted to write of my success. I sent to H. C. Delno & Co., of Columbus, O., for a $5 plater. I hav had more tableware and jewelry than I could plate ever since. I cleared $27 the first week and in three weeks $97. Any one can do plating and make money in any locality the year round. You can get circulars by addressing the above firm. WILLIAM GRAY.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. Price 25 cents.

Paper, 10 cents. For Sale at This Office.

Send 10 cents for this valuable book for young and middle-aged men, suffering from a Life-wasting Disease, as the result of youthful follies, indiscretion, and excesses in maturer years. It sets forth an External Application—A POSITIVE CURE, as it matters not how long standing, how hopeless or how many remedies you hav used. The book is worth many times its cost, and should be in the hands of those seeking a speedy and permanent cure. Address Dr. Robt. P. Fellows, Vineland, N. J., and say where you saw this advertisment.

A GOOD WORD.

Dr. Fellows is an outspoken Liberal, a humanitarian, and a generous patron of the Freethought press. He has many testimonials to the value of his progressive and successful method of treatment, and deserves patronage.—Freethought.

News of the Week.

On Sunday the 21st ult. the horse of Rev. J. Arthur Dill, Sterling, N. Y., was painted red, white, and blue while its owner was preaching. The cause of this and other like attentions is the preacher's reading love stories from the pulpit and paying over-attention to girls.

Gillespie and Verner, oil producers of Chartiers, Pa., hav been adjudged to pay $25 fine and costs for Sunday work. They say that if they stopped Sunday salt water would accumulate and ruin their wells. They will appeal.

At a meeting of Baptist ministers in Boston on the 22d ult. Rev. J. B. Stoddard denounced secret orders as pernicious to the church and said that when a man swears allegiance to Masonry he swears allegiance antagonistic to God. Rev. Mr. Cleveland rose and said: "I am a Mason, and hav listened to this scathing stigmatism of the order in patience, but I cannot longer listen to such unjust and uncalled-for abuse," and then resigned membership in the convention.

A Pittsburgh paper says that Father Mollinger impresses on his patrons that his prescriptions—often one thousand or one thousand five hundred a day—to be efficacious must be filled at a certain drug store. He then shares the druggist's receipts. At the railroad station on mornings after great attendances hundreds of cripples and other sufferers leave for home with their money gone and despair in their faces. Many are injured by the journey, and some are dying. Many had scraped together the expenses of ticket and a few days' board, but the boarding-house keepers charged unexpectedly high and numbers were left without money to return. James Hana, of Trenton, N. J., said: "Many of the cures, as far as I can learn from sufferers like myself who hav been for a week on Troy Hill, are exaggerated, and many were not effected as reported. I saw two men who, it was said, had been cured. Both of them were almost as lame as when they went to Troy Hill. It has been a bitter disappointment to many of us, who hav exhausted every cent we had in the world in coming here. If ever one man in the world had faith, I was he. I firmly believed that if Father Mollinger laid his hand on me and said: 'Arise and walk,' immediately the paralysis of my legs would leave me and I should walk. I prayed for a week, and one day I threw aside my crutches, when the priest laid his hands on my head and blessed me. I fell down and hurt my back. When I was coming over in the car this morning, on my way home, a hopelessly blind man opposit to me suddenly began to sob, and, wringing his hands, cried: 'My God, I wish I were dead!" I spoke to him, and he told me his name was Wright, and that he was from Lebanon. He said that he had mortgaged his house in order to come to Pittsburgh and be cured."

One thing may be unhesitatingly proclaimed by modern science, viz., that organized things are no more the results of separate creations than the so-called unorganized ones; that they are nothing more than special forms in which universal matter appears, and from which, like all the other individualized bodies, they hav gradually evolved.—Graber.

Almost all the ancient philosophers are agreed in regarding the universe as eternal. Ocellus Lukanus says expressly, in speaking of the universe, that it has always been and ever will be. All unprejudiced persons will feel the force of the axiom that out of nothing nothing comes. Creation, in the acceptation in which the word is used by the moderns, is a theological subtlety.—*D. Notes and Clippings.

"How about the government Indian school?" said a speaker in Congress recently. "To illustrate, this bill contains a clause appropriating $25,000 to establish a government school. This sum is used to procure the land and erect the building. Then we select a corps of teachers and employees, all to be paid out of the public treasury; we equip the school with Bibles and hymn-books paid for out of the public treasury; then we put the school in charge of some political theologian or theological politician [laughter] who receives his salary from the public treasury. This superintendent impresses his peculiar views of religion, whether Methodist, Presbyterian, Catholic, or Baptist, on the school, all at the expense of the public treasury."

THE New York Sun has discovered and published two letters by Thomas Jefferson and Thomas Paine on the purchase of Louisiana. An extract from Paine's is this: "The established religion is Roman; but in what state it is as to exterior ceremonies (such as processions and celebration) I know not. Had the cession to France continued with her, religion I suppose would hav been put on the same footing as it is in that country, and there no ceremonial of religion can appear in the streets or highways; and the same regulation is particularly necessary now or there will soon be quarrels and tumults between the settlers and the new. The Yankees will not move out of the road for a little wooden Jesus stuck on a stick and carried in procession nor kneel in the dirt to a wooden Virgin Mary. As we do not govern the territory as provinces but incorporated as states, religion there must be on the same footing it is here, and Catholics hav the same rights as Catholics hav with us and no others."

THE papal encyclical on the labor question is being forwarded to all the sovereigns and heads of governments, richly bound and accompanied by autograph letters from the holy father. Another edition will be sent to ministers of state and leading politicians and distinguished writers on economic questions. Leo is trying hard to get himself at the head of the labor movement.

PRINCE MESTCHERSKY, of Russia, is a bitter enemy of a new idea that school-children should not be flogged in the same manner as in the past. He shows that "not to spare the rod and spoil the child" is a biblical injunction, and that shaming a child in school, and putting him on his knees, and striking him with a ruler, hav been Christian institutions "for many thousands of years." Finally, he shows the religious ethical importance of punishment in the school: "A child severely punished by the teacher for his failings is made to feel that there is eternal punishment in store for all the sins of omission and of commission."

REPLYING to a newspaper desire for his view on the cultivation of the race, Alfred T. Story writes: "I find that our later Christian theology had tended greatly to degrade man; it sets before him such an unworthy motiv as the saving of his own skin as his chief 'end and aim.' Space will not permit of my arguing the matter out, but, to put it briefly, I think the day will come when a true man would as soon strip himself in the market-place as go to God with a supplication for his own advancement or 'salvation.'"

THE CHIEF PROPS OF ECCLESIASTICISM.

A RATHER interesting point was recently brought up by the Paris Figaro: A mother of strong religious convictions refuses the hand of her daughter to the man she loves, because he is bound by a vow to his dying father never to be married in church or to take part in a religious ceremony; the girl dies of a broken heart, the mother to the last refusing the concession which would hav saved her daughter's life. The Figaro asked its readers whether, under the circumstances, the mother was justified in withholding her consent. In all, the editor received 1,431 answers. Six hundred and twenty-one writers considered the mother justified in preferring death for her daughter to the dishonor of contracting a marriage unblessed by the church; 570 blamed the mother, while 200 avoided a direct answer and suggested various solutions of the problem.

THE pope will distribute three hundred titles and decorations to Papal Zouaves in Canada.

REV. A. C. DIXON, of Brooklyn, has been declaiming against the stage. According to this dogmatic divine, "the watchword of the stage is revenge." "Read Shakspere right through," he declares, "and you will find that this is so." What a narrow mind must a man hav, exclaims the Sun, how pitiably blind to wit and wisdom, beauty and pathos, must he be who can read all the plays of Shakspere and find in them nothing but the single motiv of revenge! The Rev. Mr. Dixon is like one who journeys from Dan to Beersheba and exclaims, "It is all barren." "I went myself," he continues, 'to a theater to see "The Old Homestead,' and when I came back I felt as if I would like to murder somebody. Such was the effect it had upon me." What manner of man is it in whom the mild and pathetic incidents of "The Old Homestead" excite only evil passions?

SAYS Dr. David Dudley Field: "Our noble English tung, already spoken over more of the erth's surface than any other living tung, and yet to be spoken over more, is disfigured by so many anomalies and hampered by so many arbitrary usages—rules I will not call them—that he is not merely to be commended, but haild as a deliverer who will rescue it, and, at the sacrifice of present inconvenience, giv future ease to all English-speaking people til the end of time." Such a deliverer is THE TRUTH SEEKER trying to be, as far as it can, by the dropping of silent and uncalled-for letters in many words.

ROCKFORD, Ill., young men are boycotting the Court Street M. E. church. The pastor advised his congregation not to patronize the Coots Street-car Company and park, which do business on Sunday, and the Young People's Society refused to employ the steamer Arrow for picnic purposes because it ran on Sundays. Some young men hav started a paper, the signers of which pledge themselvs not to attend any services of the Court Street church.

Jehovian Christianity.

Let us inspect the science promulgated by the inspired bosh. According to God this earth has four corners, therefore it is flat. See the Revelation of John the imbecil of Patmos, chapter vii, verse 1; it is, "And after these things I saw four angels standing on the four corners of the earth, holding the four winds of the earth, that the wind should not blow on the earth, nor on the sea, nor on any tree."

Either the earth has four corners or John was a lunatic. In those sacred days when God dictated this verse the belief in a flat earth was common even to uninspired fools. A few hundred years ago when an uninspired son of nature proclaimed the earth was spherical and revolved around the sun, the Bible was used by Christians to prove his lunacy. Who, I pray, was the idiot, Hydrocephalous John or Copernicus? Job also was unaware of the rotundity of the earth. Let him bawl out, ix, 6, "Which [God] shaketh the earth out of her place, and the pillars thereof tremble." When Job boiled out, all his acquaintances believed the earth was mounted on pillars. Some of those ancient savants went further and said the pillars were carried on the back of a huge turtle. God's bosh teaches that the sun rises and sets. Let us again go to the bawler, ix, 7, "Which [God] commandeth the sun and it riseth not." Job knew little. That little did not include a remedy for boils. It is only about three hundred years since Copernicus discovered the true relations of the solar system. At that time, Martin Luther, with Bible proof, charged Copernicus with being a fool, and called him an ignorant astrologer for asserting what the Bible clearly refuted. Even Brother Talmage will now admit Copernicus was right and Luther and God's botch wrong. Is Martin Luther to be trusted in theology? Let him speak for himself. "Every doer of the law and every moral worker is accursed, for he walketh in the presumption of his own righteousness" (Table Talk). "If men only believe enough in Christ they can commit adultery and murder a thousand times a day without periling their salvation" (Ibid). "He that says the gospel requires works for salvation, I say flat and plain, he is a liar" (Ibid) Such we find to be the teachings of Martin Luther, and "of such is the kingdom of heaven." Luther's science and moral theories were bad; could he not also hav been mistaken about Protestantism? To-day, when Jasper in the sunny South asserts "de sun do move," he forces the laugh of even Christians. The Bible, Luther, and Jasper are inspired.

Concerning the seat of intellect let Christ tell what he knows. Matt. xiii, 15, says, "For this people's heart is waxed gross, and their ears are dull of hearing, and their eyes they hav closed: lest at any time they should see with their eyes, and hear with their ears, and should understand with their heart, and should be converted, and I should heal them." What a magnificent portrayal of a Christian who refuses to peruse Infidel literature. Why did not Jesus allude to the brain instead of the heart? The rest of his references are scientific. Why were not all? When he was in Jerusalem the people supposed, and continued to be deceived for centuries after his crucifixion, that the breast and not the head contained the mind.

Science—what we know—is entirely at variance with God's holy word. No living scientist of great reputation believes in the plenary inspiration of God's holy word. No living scientist of great reputation believes in the plenary inspiration of God's botch. The great death-blow struck Christianity in the discoveries of Charles Darwin. "The Origin of Species," and "Descent of Man," are books written by this illustrious thinker which all intelligent Christians should read. It may be interesting to state that no naturalist worthy the name is not a disciple of Darwin. Even many theologians are, and hav deposited Moses in the tomb of discredit and sculptured a lyre in memoriam on his sepulcher.

If the Bible is actually the word of God, it certainly does not contradict itself. What would you think of a witness who told several different stories in court? God's word contains hundreds of self-contradictions. We will note a few. "Therefore, Michal, the daughter of Saul, had no child unto the day of her death" (2 Sam. vi, 23). It's a lie, for here is Sam with "the five sons of Michal, the daughter of Saul" (2 Sam. xxi, 8). You see Sam either lied, or else "Michal, the daughter of Saul," gave birth to five sons on the day of her death. Sam was not very cute, for before he had penned twenty-two chapters of his great work, he contradicted himself. Do you find contradictions in my essay, dear reader? If you do not it is a sure indication that I am inspired by Satan. Samuel, you know, was inspired by God. Of course everyone knows "with God all things are possible." Yes, "And the Lord was with Judah, and he drave out the inhabitants of the mountain; but could not drive out the inhabitants of the valley, because they had chariots of iron" (Judges i, 19). Now, when I read this and saw God could not successfully operate against "chariots of iron," I was tempted to think the old woman might hav been right when she said, "God can't turn a grindstone both ways at the same time." John i, 18, says: "No man hath seen God at any time," and Isaiah says (vi, 1), "In the year that King Uzziah died, I saw, also, the Lord sitting upon a throne, high and lifted up." I coincide with Jack, yet I really desire to see "the Lord lifted up." "Whom [God] no man hath seen nor can see" is what 1 Tim. vi, 16, tells us; yet we see by Gen. xxxii, 30, "For I hav seen God face to face, and my life is preserved." And again, Ex. xxxiii, 20, informs that "No man shall see God and liv," and Ex. xxxiii, 23, says God took away his hand and showed some one his back part. Does revelation speak to the Baptist exactly the same words it utters to the Methodist? Does it inform the Unitarian all it sets forth to the Episcopalian? Does it murmur the same sweet promises to Presbyterian and Universalist? Does it teach Catholics precisely what it does Protestants? Is it the divulgence to the Infidel that it is to the religious cliques? Is the way of life so plain that even a fool cannot err therein?

Some folks—chiefly human drones—seem to hav a mountainous regard for the Bible. They appear to think that only therein are found principles which are suitable stone and mortar with which nations should be built. This book, if from God, should contain only the purest, clean thought. For vulgarity, however, the holy hash is unrivaled. The vilest imagination cannot father filthier offspring than God's word furnishes. The reader is referred to the forthcoming selections to prove my assertion: Isa. xxxvi, 12, "That they may eat their own ——, and drink their own —— with you." The reasons we insert this fragment are: 1. Because it is the word of God; 2. Because the Bible, from which it is extracted, is a book said by our postmaster-general to be fit for men, women, and children to study; 3. Because I wish every person in Christendom to know of this inspired language, for I am satisfied that few Christians up to date know of all the "wonderful things in the Bible I see." Acting with those said reasons, we will now set forth more of God's sacred smut: Isa. iii, 17, "And the Lord will discover their ——." Job xl, 17, "He moveth his —— like a cedar; the sinews of his —— are wrapped together." Ezek. ix, 12, "Thou shalt bake with —— that cometh out of man." Will Brother Talmage please read to his congregation Gen. xxxviii—nastiness? Will some pious party closely inspect Lev. xv, 16–33? Let him pore over Solomon's Song, vii. In fact, let him read the entire book of God. The Catholic church, concerning this sacred scum, has taken the proper position. What a beautiful book is the Christian's Bible to read in public schools. What splendid things for youth to hear. Protestant parsons condemn the theological works of Dens and Liguori—Catholic—with denunciations of divine gall; but, with great circumspection, they invariably fail to mention that those works are only equaled in filth by the ancient asininity of the great Jehovah. Let us hav a little fairness, even in religious controversy. What attitude toward dirty polygamy does God's sacred slush assume? Was not Solomon the wisest spirit ever prisoned in house of dust? Did not "before the world was, I am" giv him seven hundred wives and three hundred concubines? Consequently polygamy is a virtue sought after by the wise. Thus Mormonism is heavenly wisdom. Who will illustrate the attempted loving sacrifice of the cherishing damsel Abishag? What a conspicuous habitation she must adorn in the "city not made with hands." Wonder if she's with David now? What illustrious patriarchal enemies of the wine-cup were Lot and Noah. How fearfully wicked mankind once was for them to hav been the fairest specimens. What a horrible crime the "looking backward" Mrs. Lot committed compared with the subsequent conduct of her man and daughters. Why was not the "pillar of salt" used to preserve the race?

Having learned a little about the origination, beliefs, etc., of Jehovian Christianity, let us ascertain its most important methods of civilizing the world.

If anything has cursed humanity it is alcoholic drink. But why should clergymen rant against this evil? The Bible favors the sale of strong drink. Any saloonkeeper of common intelligence knows that Jesus Christ was a wine drinker, that he made and gave it away free of charge. If it is not wrong to freely giv an article, it certainly is not wicked to sell the same. 1 Tim. v, 23, of God's sacred scum tells us to "drink no longer water, but use a little wine for thy stomach's sake and thine often infirmities." Then why do not parsons, like Christ, make wine and distribute it among their parishioners? I don't see how our parsons can transgress God's command and try to hinder an inebriate from fixing up his stomach. Our pious people who admire so much the religion of the "pilgrim fathers," and who desire to suppress and annihilate the liquor business, should suggest as a means of extermination the method of the Puritans in dealing with the sacred sling-sin. Our admirable ancestors insisted that the most pious church-member in a village should be the toddy trade. No sinner or Infidel in the days of the Puritans was permitted to sell liquor. I once heard a minister lament that "the stars in mind are all swallowed by the toddy trade." It may be. At any rate, judging from statistics, they are not to be found among clergymen. I am told the parsons create more idiotic sons than do either the doctors or lawyers. Yet the greatest man in this world is a clergyman's son. I am afraid, however, that this fact will afford the Talmages little consolation, for his name is Ingersoll. Nearly every Protestant parson of to-day dares to differ with God and Jesus by being a disciple of total abstinence. A few isolated texts in the sacred book appear to indicate these "called" are instructed by God to arraign the great error. But why did not the pious parsons of one hundred years ago find in the holy orders these warnings against strong drink? Plenty of people are still living who well recollect that a few years ago the parson was frequently punched and toddied every visit to members of his flock. "Ah! my friends!" the old-time honest pious parson gloried in such sacred words as these: "Drink thy wine with a merry heart; for God now accepteth thy works" (Eccl. ix, 7); "Wine that maketh glad the heart of man" (Ps. civ, 15); "Wine which cheereth God and man" (Jud. ix, 13); "Giv strong drink unto him that is ready to perish," etc.; "Drink, yea, drink abundantly, O, believers." And the stomach remedy text. Such is the manner in which our heavenly father "tells of his love in the book he has given."

It has taken Christianity about eighteen hundred years to find out that alcohol is a spirit far worse than its imaginary "evil one." Let us see how Infidels hav regarded this spirit—that corrupt class who disbelieve in the "evil one." The first temperance paper published in Europe was published by an Infidel, Joseph Lindsay. The first temperance paper published in America was published also by an Infidel—William Lloyd Garrison—a Spiritualist. And the first book ever written in favor of total abstinence had an Atheist, the worst kind of an Infidel, for an author—Judge Herttell. All this is singular, is it not? Remember, the Bible had been in existence over a thousand years, God had shown some one his back part, Christ had been here and gone there, Christian pulpits had been pounded for eighteen hundred years, and theology had held full sway over man's intellect; yet Infidels first dared to publicly fight intemperance. Rather remarkably strange, seeing us Infidels are so corrupt, according to Talmage!

Millions and millions of dollars hav been given by believers for the purpose of converting to Jehovian Christianity so-called heathen, many of whom liv more moral lives than the donors. How much good this vast expenditure of money for missions has accomplished will never be determined until after Infidels hav "called for the rocks and mountains to fall on them." An archdeacon of Bombay says that "for every truly converted Christian the drinking practices of English Christians hav made a thousand drunkards." No doubt it is true. While in Florida I formed the acquaintance of an Englishman who owned a large grocery store, who preached to the nativs every Sunday about Christ, and who, without jest, was apparently a gentleman. But he sold pine-apple cider, and being enticed by its pretty color, one day I drank three glasses of this beverage. The effect was such upon me that while I write I hav not myself much confidence in the civilizing effect of English religion. The Abbe Dubois labored as a missionary in India for thirty years. He states that during twenty years he made only between two and three hundred converts. He says "of this number two-thirds were pariahs or beggars, and the rest were shudras, vagrants, and outcasts of several tribes. And I will declare it with shame and confusion that I do not remember anyone who embraced Christianity from conviction and from quite disinterested motivs. And many of them apostatized and relapsed into paganism." He concludes by owning that those who continued Christians were the very worst of his flock. Here is a paragraph from the Watchman, a periodical Christians cannot refuse to allow the claims of: "A gentleman who has recently returned from extensiv travels in India told the writer that in one of their cities he delivered an address upon Christianity to an audience of three hundred Brahmans, who spoke better English than he did, and who afterward came in large numbers to his bungalow asking him to answer the arguments against Christianity in a tract they handed him, which he found to be one of Colonel Ingersoll's speeches." You see those Brahmans not only "spoke better English," but possessed better sense, than the missionary. With the colonel's brain reaching into India I am afraid the pious missionaries will make few converts. Christian missions are nearly all stupendous humbugs. Why not quit the happy heathen and spend money wasted paying taxes on church property, thus alleviating poverty in America? Christian missions hav introduced rum all over this world. Let us dismiss this repulsiv subject.

How does Christianity stand in relation to the rights of woman? We will investigate this matter. We will quote first from the man who desires everyone to be tossed into the "bottomless pit." "The men who declare that woman is the intellectual inferior of man do not, and cannot by offering themselvs in evidence, substantiate their declaration." This is hell's opinion—the mind of Bob Ingersoll, so named by disrespectful Christians. Now let us go to sacred St. Paul. "Wives, submit yourselvs to your own husbands" (Col. iii, 18). "As the church is subject unto Christ, so let the wives be to their own husbands in everything" (Eph. v, 24). "Let woman learn in silence with all subjection. But I suffer not a woman to teach, nor to usurp authority over the man, but to be in silence. For Adam was first formed, then Eve; and Adam was not deceived, but the woman being deceived was in the transgression" (1 Tim. ii, 11–14). According to Paul, what? Why, the most damnable doctrin relativ to woman's rights ever conceived. Paul also says the only object for a Christian to marry is to satisfy lust to avoid burning. He remarks, "It is good for a man not to touch a woman; nevertheless, to avoid fornication, let every man hav his own wife." Why do not the Talmages follow Paul's advice and become Catholic priests? Many of our parsons would make good priests. Let us see what Moses thought about the ladies. "And thy desire shall be to thy husband, and he shall rule over thee" (Gen. iii, 16). This is what God said, and his sacred smut degrades woman for the sole reason that Eve ate the famous apple. Everyone who is posted relativ to Jehovian Christianity knows that this species of religion, through its Eden garden, Eve, and apple yarn, degraded woman for centuries. And also that "the first statesmen of recent times to urge equal political rights for women were two French Infidels, Sieyes and Condorcet." The women of America at the head of this movement for perfect liberty, Mary Wolstonecraft, Frances Wright, Ernestine L Rose, Elizabeth Cady Stanton, Susan B. Anthony, Amy Post," etc., are not Jehovian Christians. Let me say here before I forget, that when it was first proposed to use sulphuric ether to lessen the pains of childbirth, Christians resisted, because God had said to woman (see Moses's mud): "In sorrow shalt thou bring forth children." People once thought it was a sin to violate any of God's commands. Nowadays even Christians dislike pain. Still another thing I wish to insert here, though out of place, is, that when Raikes less than one hundred years since proposed to hav Sunday-schools, the churches at first violently antagonized his project. These schools now, by bastiling youthful minds, manufacture all our Christians. I claim that an intelligent being who in infancy and childhood has not been taught to believe, in manhood cannot be made a believer. Without calling Sunday-schools a blessing, I respectfully ask some one to state only a single reform which has not been fought against in the name of Christ.

Human slavery—an institution which permits all crimes—was fostered by God; see his Bible, Gen. ix, 25; Lev. xxv, 45, 46; Joel iii, 8; Ex. xxi, 2–4; Tim. vi, 1; Titus ii, 9; Eph. vi, 5; 1 Pet. ii, 18. And his only son, the carpenter Jesus, said not a word against this damnably divine doctrin. This slimy serpent crawled along down the centuries, contaminating and corrupting the entire world. Finally it was attacked and its head snapped off. Who led the attack? Was it Christians? Was it a parson? Let us post ourselvs. That villainous despotism, slavery, we must recollect, existed when Jesus was on earth. Now, Jesus knew what an awful curse it then was. He saw the future life of man mapped out before him. He knew that between the years 1860 and 1865 over a half million saviors would be sacrificed that slavery should nevermore curse the United States. He said nothing against slavery. Instead of casting out a few devils, why did not Jesus cast out slavery? Why did not this redeemer say, "Thou shalt not traffic in human beings?" The fact is, Christ loved human slavery. The New Testament advocates it. Christians owned slaves during all the centuries. And only a few short years ago said Rev. Dr. Wilbur Fisk, president of the Wesleyan University, "The New Testament enjoins obedience upon the slave as an obligation due to a present rightful authority." Only a few short years ago said Rev. Moses Stuart, of Andover, "The precepts of the New Testament respecting the demeanor of slaves and their masters beyond all question recognize the existence of slavery." Only a few years ago said Professor Hodge, of Princeton, "The savior found it [slavery] around him, the apostles met it in Asia, Greece, and Italy. How did they treat it? Not by denunciation of slave-holding as necessarily sinful." Only a few years ago said Rev. Dr. Taylor, principal of the theological department of Yale College, "I hav no doubt that if Jesus Christ were on earth now, he would, under certain circumstances, become a slaveholder." Slavery flourished in America because the Bible plainly teaches it is all right; because antebellum divines more honestly interpreted the Bible than do ministers now; and because Christians were not sufficiently Infidelized. Let us see what Infidelity did toward obliterating slavery in this country. "Prominent among the old-time Abolitionists were three Infidels—William Lloyd Garrison, Gerritt Smith, and Wendell Philips. Here are the names of a few of their aids: Parker Pillsbury, Henry C. Wright, Elizur Wright, Stephen Foster, Abby Kelley, Frances Wright, and Lucretia Mott; every one of them Infidels." And any one of them far superior to any crucified savior in heroism. These people sought to abolish what? Reluctantly, perhaps, the Christian is forced to answer, a doctrin of Christianity. While every blessed minister of God in the South was proving by the sacred scare-crow that slavery was from heaven, nearly every clergyman in the North favored slavery or was a silent coward. Seventy-five years ago no orthodox church in the North would open its doors to an opponent of slavery. Is not this strange? Is it not also singular, considering all the tracts issued by Christians to attract sheep into "the fold of Christ," that during the antislavery crusade not a single tract was issued by any church against property in human flesh and blood? I am aware that some little support was given by the pulpit to this great Infidel movement, but it came principally from such men as William Ellery Channing, Theodore Parker, and Henry Ward Beecher; and if these men were not after all Infidels, then the orthodox church is to-day a liar. Let it be understood that it was Christians—not Infidels—who dragged Garrison through Boston's streets. And why? Simply because he rebelled against "our Lord," and wished to plead that black sheep might occupy as good a fold on earth as white sheep. God, Christ, the Ghost, hell, heaven, and Satan could not subdue the enthusiasm of Garrison. Said he: "I am in earnest. I will not equivocate. I will not excuse. I will not retract a single inch, and I will be heard!" He was heard on earth while millions disturbed the atmosphere with prayers to God that human slavery might forever be. Those prayers to heaven were, as usual, not answered. Then there are names of other Infidels connected inseparably with this great reform. Abraham Lincoln, whose equal, in many substantial respects, never before lived, was a skeptic. It is not necessary to now narrate the story of his part in the nation's history. We will place for inspection the name of this son of nature with that of a Christian, John Wilkes Booth, his assassin. Lincoln in his early years wrote an Infidel book. It was never published, however, as the fact that he was elected president evidences. He often voiced this shrewd expression, "It will not do to investigate the subject of religion too closely, as it is apt to lead to Infidelity." Charles Sumner was another apostle of liberty who was an Infidel, and although I do not know, I will bet the bully Brooks, who assaulted him in the Senate, was a Christian. He who believes the Bible must admit that slavery was once a blessing; that God favored it; and that when God countenanced it, his adversary, the devil, objected to it. If slavery is now a crime, will Talmage or one of his coadjutors tell me when God concluded it was? And at that time did Satan also change his mind and seek to perpetuate what he previously desired to annihilate? The orthodox theory of mysticism is that all evil in this world is caused by the devil, although God did "raise the devil." Therefore, if an individual commits sin the devil has him, and conversely, where a non-mercenary act is effected God is manager of the actor. Now, remembering the inaugurators of the slavery reform were Infidels, which, I ask, of the two imaginary governors of man owned these Infidels when they warred slavery? Also, is it possible for one to be an Infidel and not be in the devil's clutches? Also, Mr. Talmage, which one of your living incomprehensibilities has a lien on the writer? Northern Christianity is now ashamed of its slavery record. The only ludicrous part of this sorrowful reflection is, that, after cherishing slavery for hundreds of years, after this vice had reddened the South with blood, the churches hav the effrontery to boastfully claim they released the blacks from bondage. Even the pope joins in the demand for honor. Honor for what? For obliterating part of the inspired meaning of the Bible. That is all. Soon, when Infidels hav compelled Christians to rely wholly on reason, the churches, I suppose, will claim credit for that also.

Apropos of slavery, let us speak of Jefferson Davis. I once knew of a Northern parson who said there was not dirt enough to cover Mr. Davis. His parson, however, entertained a somewhat different regard for this truly Christian gentleman. Let us take a sensible view of this matter. Mr. Davis knew God authorized slavery in the Holy Land. He knew Christ did not consider it a sin. He knew the Bible sanctioned bondage of every description. He knew it was a thoroughly Christian vice.

He knew a few rank Infidels first violently and persistently suggested that slavery might not be quite the right thing. He knew the Abolition movement was started by Infidels. He perhaps knew his rival, Lincoln, was an Infidel. He knew every pulpiteer in the slave states favored slavery. I now ask, what evil did Mr. Davis do? Did he not fight for what Jehovah, Christ, and Paul thought perfectly proper? Why heap needless dirt on Mr. Davis? He was born a Christian, lived a Christian, died a Christian, was given a Christian burial, was eulogized by thousands of Christian parsons, and he is now residing in "the Christian's home of glory," resting calmly in Abraham's bosom, willingly watching with childish innocence Abraham Lincoln yell in hell "with the devil and his angels."

The remark made by the Northern parson about Mr. Davis if delivered in the Christian state of Mississippi would almost insure him a dismissal from earth consisting in an aerial elevation by means of a rope.

Many parsons preach doctrins to suit their hearers. I admire Jefferson Davis. He was an honest man. His slaves he never misused. He was intelligent. He was not a coward. His Mexican war record testifies to his bravery. All I dislike respecting Mr. Davis are his Jehovian qualities.

Obviously history portrays the churches as ever attempting to coffin progress. When the art of printing was discovered the Christian church denounced it as the work of Satan. Faust, the inventor, was stigmatized a copartner with the devil, and efforts were made to deprive him of his life. When this sublime invention was introduced into England the pious bishop of London, addressing a convocation of his clergy, said, "If we do not destroy this dangerous invention it will one day destroy us." I am anxious to think he prophesied correctly. Why did not Christ, if it is so necessary to believe he was the incarnate son of God, invent the printing-press and print his gospel, thus furnishing sufficient evidence of his divinity? Print has enlightened the world, not religion.

The great bulldog, orthodoxy, of Christianity, has constantly crouched in the path of progress. Once his malignant jaws, with the ferocity of Jehovah, devoured all who incurred his displeasure. A few Infidels attacked him with the discoveries of thought. He bit and barked with hydrophobic madness. The attack of genius has been renewed again and again, and the nineteenth century's closing years see this cursed cur dwell solely in realms of ignorant repose, from out of which an occasional snap and snarl is heard to indicate this cruel monster yet survives. And all God's Bibles and all God's men cannot put orthodoxy where it was again.

The reason is palpable why skepticism has originated all reforms. It is this: Christianity at all times is a perfect system. Whatever is, is for the best through God, and it is not necessary to combat what the "son of man" failed to speak against. "Our Lord" told of all wickedness, such as possession of devils, witchcraft; of riches; of honest unbelief, etc. Therefore, what is the use of fighting what Infidels alone claim are existing evils, for we shall migrate to realms of eternal bliss in a few years, and it makes little difference what we endure on this earth?

The Christian side-show by fixing man's mind on "mansions in the skies" has thus checked the advance of progress. Thus we hav given the reasons why the suggesters of and leaders in nearly every reform hav been Infidels. The Christ-adorers hav ever at the start furiously objected to all good changes, but after the accomplishment hav always been cheeky enough to praise themselvs for correcting themselvs.

What is a hell-fire Christian? Ans. One who is amused blowing soap-bubbles in a world of misery. It does not palliate our conduct to say suffering is brought by man's folly. It is the result of ignorance; every wail of agony, every disease, every premature death, I repeat, is the result of our and our ancestors' ignorance of nature's laws. Stop your foolish threats of divine revenge and help educate the masses. It is impossible to estimate the detriment superstition has been to the welfare of humanity. Religion is a good if it is a good religion. Lacking the necessity of belief to day's Christianity would be tolerable. As it is, it is a nuisance.

EDWIN M. BEECHER.

CHRISTIANITY is alleged to be a supernatural, historical fact. The historical sciences can be made to show—and, to my mind, beyond the possibility of contradiction—that it is not a supernatural fact, and that there never has been such a thing as a supernatural fact. We do not reject miracles upon the ground of a priori reasonings, but upon the ground of critical and historical reasoning. We hav no difficulty in proving that miracles do not happen in the nineteenth century, and that the stories of miraculous events said to hav taken place in our day are based upon imposture and credulity. But the evidence in favor of the so-called miracles of the last three centuries, or even of those of the Middle Ages, is weaker still; and the same may be said of those dating from a still earlier period, for the further back one goes the more difficult does it become to prove a supernatural fact.—Renan.

Reply to Mr. Jamieson.

As usual, friend Jamieson is the early bird who sees the worm, and who, let us hope, also catches it. He is the solitary lecturer who last year replied to our appeals in a series of friendly letters through the papers, and announced his intention of coming to the Portsmouth congress to pave the way for some plan which would be mutually beneficial to lecturers and to the American Secular Union. That intention he was unfortunately prevented from carrying out; but we are glad to see that he comes once more to the front as a lecturer who is desirous of coöperating with the American Secular Union.

Before discussing his offer of coöperation, let us correct a slight misapprehension under which Mr. Jamieson seems to be laboring. He says:

"Perhaps the lecturers are not to blame for this 'masterly inactivity.' . . . Lecturers are neither able nor willing to divide their slender incomes with the Union. They cannot carry the Union financially."

This is indeed news, that the directors of the American Secular Union ask Liberal lecturers to help support the American Secular Union out of their "slender income." Were not the words before me in black and white, I would question the fact of such a statement being made by so level-headed a man as Mr. Jamieson. When, where, or how did the American Secular Union ever make such a request of any lecturer? Surely Mr. Jamieson is dreaming, or else he has been misinformed.

But what we hav asked, and what we hav a right to expect, I think, is that every Freethought lecturer in the country, whether paid in dollars and cents for it or not, should, when opportunity offers, mention at least the existence of the American Secular Union, as a society organized for the express purpose of state secularization, and holding out a welcome to Liberals of all isms. More than that, it is manifestly the duty of every lecturer who loves the cause, not only to mention our existence, but to suggest the advisability of their audiences coöperating with us. But I hav heard, on excellent authority, of audiences which hav listened to one Liberal lecturer after another, week in and week out, without ever hearing from said lecturers that there was a society such as the American Secular Union working for state secularization. I myself listened some months since to a very able lecture on the duty of resisting the encroachments of ecclesiasticism upon the state, without hearing one word mentioned of the existence of the American Secular Union already organized for such resistance, and that, too, although the lecturer knew that President Westbrook and myself were in the audience.

In all reform work that is of any account, friendly help is given of which the recipient never knows. Not a day passes that I do not find occasion to speak a friendly word for, or advertise in one way or another, some Liberal who never knows of it, and who will never thank me. More than one person who has berated me in the papers has profited, and will doubtless profit again, by some friendly act on my part of which he will never know, and of which I now make mention only in this general way not to plume myself on any special amiab lity but to emphasize my point, that those who love a cause such as ours must love it better than they do the contemplation of their personal grievances if they would be worthy of its regards. Shall we then speak a friendly word for only such branches of the Freethought work as bring us in dollars and cents? Perish the thought, so unworthy a genuin reformer!

Nevertheless, the laborer is worthy of his hire; and, although our treasury has never been full to overflowing, we long ago made the following offer as a beginning, viz: That to a lecturer organizing a new auxiliary society we would return half of the charter fee sent us. Whether we shall ever hav any claimants for this percentage remains to be seen. Meanwhile, let us turn to the discussion of Mr. Jamieson's offer.

Mr. Jamieson states that he is ready to volunteer in the work of coöperating with the American Secular Union from the 1st day of October on, at a definit salary per year. He adds: "I think the Liberals of this country would rather sustain ten lecturers at $300 each from a common fund, than to pay one man $2,000 or $3,000 a year."

If this is the way the Liberals of the country really feel, we trust they will duly send in the necessary $300 which is the price of Mr. Jamieson's coöperation, and we, on our part, shall be very glad indeed to hand same over to him, in monthly or quarterly instalments as preferred, and do what we can to help him in making appointments. As Mr. Jamieson is the first and only lecturer to respond to our appeals for coöperation, we think it only fair that he should hav the first chance. We would suggest, however, that the engagement with Mr. Jamieson continue at first only during October and November, as different arrangements might possibly be made at the annual congress in the fall, which might upset that arrangement with Mr. Jamieson, or which, on the contrary, might substitute a still better stipend than $300 per year. Meanwhile, during these two months, he would be sure of his salary, provided, of course, that those Liberals desirous of securing Mr. Jamieson's services to advertise the cause of state secularization send the amount into this office in due season. And if Mr. Jamieson himself will make it convenient to attend the congress, no doubt his wide experience as a lecturer will greatly assist the officers of the American Secular Union in formulating the hoped for plan whereby a sufficient amount may be raised from the Liberals throughout the country to justify us in paying salaries to all Liberal lecturers, good, bad, and indifferent, in addition to their regular pay from their audiences and in addition to the amount necessary for the running expenses of the American Secular Union. "In a multitude there is counsel,"—sometimes, that is, when one is not troubled by the other adage about "too many cooks." Nevertheless, we sincerely hope that Mr. Jamieson's suggestion will be acted on, for we hav reason to believe that he is a speaker who will do credit to any cause he may advocate. It would giv us genuin pleasure if we should receive the funds which will enable us to announce his "coöperation" with the American Secular Union for next October and November, and, possibly, after the congress, for the balance of the fiscal year.

As to Mr. Jamieson's very laudable desire to agree to no plan that will exclude any brother or sister lecturer, we honor him for that feeling; but, as officers of the American Secular Union, we must insist on our right to use discrimination in accepting the services of such lecturers as may offer. All sincere and earnest people are not equally desirable as speakers; and, while Dr. Westbrook and I are intrusted with the management of this society, we expect to select out of the material offered to us the very best we can find.

The Secular Penny.

In a recent article I showed that, as last year's contributions to the American Secular Union were less than $1,800, this would giv, at the rate of one cent per Liberal, less than one hundred and eighty thousand people who believe in the separation of church and state sufficiently to giv one penny toward such separation. I added:

> Now you know as well as I, that the people who believe ardently in the separation of church and state—not counting the careful, half-way people who are waiting to know if a thing is going to be popular before they indorse it—number much more than this. They are, in fact, so numerous, that if every person who believes outspokenly in the separation of church and state were to pay one penny a year to the American Secular Union, this organization would hav a financial power in the land that would cause its appeals to our lawmakers to be not only respected, but also heeded.

As the result of this statement, this morning's mail brings a contribution which we hope is but the precursor of others to follow. Mr. A. R. Crihfield, of Lincoln, Ill., takes us at our word, and sends us one penny for each of the five members of his family, or a total of five cents. Think what might be accomplished if every Liberal in the United States were likewise to send in his penny to the American Secular Union within the next thirty days!

First of all, we could stop bothering you with appeals for money for the rest of the year. We could print and issue a thousand pamphlets where we now issue a dozen. We could hav, in some central location, a reading-room where all the most radical books, and especially the Liberal papers, could always be on hand, in charge of some intelligent, cultivated Liberal who could make this room a desirable place for business men and women to drop in and hear the issues of the day discussed informally. We could afford not only to subsidize every lecturer now in the field as a coöperator with the society in the work of secularizing the state, but we could, like the National Religious Liberty Association of the Seventh Day people, hav special agents on hand whose duty it would be to start at an hour's notice to any town in the United States to oppose the practical union of church and state.

All this could be done, and more, if every person who believes in the Nine Demands of our constitution were to send us one penny a year.

Do you think this an over-estimate? Tell me how many people in the United States believe in the separation of church and state? One in fifty? Why, of course, and a much, much larger proportion; in fact, the majority of the American people are opposed to the union of church and state. But how many do you think would agree to the Nine Demands? One in fifty? Again you smile, and say that I am under-estimating enormously the proportion of those who are friendly to the Nine Demands. But suppose I take a still smaller proportion—one in sixty-five. Then suppose that each Liberal in the country contributes his annual penny—the heads of families, as did Mr. Crihfield, sending in a penny for each minor, who will presumably be Liberal on coming of age. What result do we get, allowing the very small proportion of only one Liberal in sixty-five? The latest census giv sixty-five millions of people in the United States, so that we should get one million pennies, or $10,000. But I am sure you will admit that the proportion of those who are friendly to the Nine Demands is vastly greater than one in sixty-five, and that, consequently, if each Liberal in the country contributed his annual penny, we should hav a good deal more than $10,000. Then, in addition, are those generous souls who are both able and willing to contribute to a cause like ours—and all the more readily if it were flourishing and accomplishing practical results—not pennies, but dollars, up into the hundreds and thousands.

How I do wish, with all my heart, that there could be such a stirring of the dry bones of Liberalism as would result in some such universal and spontaneous action as I hav suggested above! Let us hope that around the Crihfield five-cent piece which this morning's mail brings, will erelong be piled up other Secular pennies, in an ever-increasing heap. Let us hope that, on the other hand, those who, like our friend Mr. Butterfield, of Sacramento, stand ready to pledge so much yearly for the work of distributing pamphlets, will come forward with their tens or hundreds of dollars. Let the local auxiliaries send in their quarterly dues of five cents per member; and let those individual members of the national society who want to giv something in addition to the Secular Penny not be backward about coming forward. It were idle to hope that the Secular Penny plan will be adopted immediately by every Liberal—although I trust the day is not far distant when every faithful Liberal will pay his Secular Penny as promptly as does the devout Catholic his Peter's pence. But until that good day comes, the few Liberals will hav to bear the burdens of the many as they hav done in the past, and make up, by their own generous individual donations, for the lack of contributions from Liberalism at large.

Meanwhile, let us not forget that with every Secular Penny that rolls over to join Mr. Crihfield's five-cent piece the good time draws nearer—the time of helpful, fraternal coöperation of all Freethought forces, newspapers and lecturers, individual workers, Liberal societies and a well-equipped, well-organized American Secular Union, all working shoulder to shoulder for the cause dear to all—the right to freedom of thought.

My First Lecture Trip.

TO THE FRIENDS OF FREETHOUGHT: I shall commence my first lecture trip through the states on the 6th of September next, having decided to take the advice of Mr. Jamieson and start out in the lecture field unbound and unfettered, on my own independent feet. My exertions, however, cannot avail much without your assistance. Without your help I can accomplish nothing. It is my desire during this trip to carry on as spirited an advocacy of Secularism as possible; to join my labors to those of our lecturers already in the field, so that with our united efforts we may conduct a well-directed attack upon the citadel of orthodoxy. A great work is required yet before man can be said to be free, and at present the laborers are few. There are more that are willing to work in our cause, but alas! they cannot get that support which they honestly deserve.

Those who know me well know that I love the storm and am willing to combat any opposition with which the power of superstition can greet us. Myself an Atheist, I hav always advocated the complete rejection of all the Gods ever preached, because none of them, of which I hav yet heard, appears calculated to promote the happiness of mankind. I war against theology because it robs man of the reality, life here, while it only deludes him with the shadow, life hereafter. In this undertaking I do not wish to be claimed as a leader, but I wish you to regard me as a standard-bearer, a soldier battling in the ranks of freedom. Upon my flag shall be inscribed the word, "Humanity." My constant endeavor will be to elevate my colors high, still higher, and ever higher.

I hav already succeeded in securing engagements to lecture in Pittsburgh; Shreve, O; Canal Dour; Chicago, and a few other places along the route, and probably several in Michigan, Illinois, and Iowa. I would also respectfully ask those friends to whom I hav already written to answer me as early as possible, or I must make applications elsewhere. Friends along the route and in the different states named that desire my services can address me at 505 East 83d street, New York city. My terms are as low as I could possibly make them, believing thereby to secure more engagements and thus be able to do more for the good of our cause.

JOHN R. CHARLESWORTH.

Mr. Swartz, Libel, Special Laws, and Government.

With Mr. Macdonald's condemnation of such papers as the Kansas City Sunday Sun I am in hearty agreement. I am aware that they are meddling, blackmailing, in almost every way infamous sheets. They carry the tactics of many of the great dailies to the extreme of meanness, avarice, and cruelty. They cling to a position in the journalistic scale far below that occupied by the illustrated sporting journals. Sometimes they expose a crime against the weak, sometimes they rap a hypocrit over the knuckles, but these good deeds are lost in such a seething mass of blackmail, invasions, and falsehood that they lose their force and cleansing qualities. None except the few actually conversant with the facts are able to distinguish the little timely truth in the great compost-heap of defamation and sneaking Paul Pryism. They are even less reliable as a scavengers' index than the "Crimes of Preachers."

In view of these and similar indisputable facts I am sorry beyond the power of words to express that so trne a man, so kindly and gentle a gentleman, so chivalrous a knight of liberty, and so logical a thinker as Clarence Swartz should hav engaged in the circulation of such a paper as the Sun. That he could hav mistaken the character of the paper may seem incredible to a man of the years and metropolitan experience of the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, yet such is undoubtedly the fact. I do not know what his opinion now is, but it is not so very long ago that he maintained that the Sun was not a blackmailing publication, and I, knowing him well, hav not the least doubt of the absolute sincerity of his contention. In explanation of this great mistake of Mr. Swartz it is to be said that he is a very young man, ardent, generous, loyally devoted to the freedom of speech and of the press, and little acquainted with the disreputable class of journals represented by the Sunday Sun. In further explanation it may be observed that the Sun's attorney is an old Kingman county acquaintance of Mr. Swartz; and it is quite possible that the lawyer's representations may hav colored the opinions of Mr. Swartz, for it will not be disputed that when a special pleader fails to make the worse appear the better part, his tongue has lost its cunning and his employers can hav no more use for him. That Clarence L. Swartz failed to perceive that in working for the Kansas City Sunday Sun he was directly antagonizing the fundamental principles of personal liberty and social solidarity which he was striving to establish, none can regret more keenly than do his fellow-champions of the right of individual initiativ in all departments of human activity.

But neither the villainous character of the Sunday Sun nor Mr. Swartz's mistaken idea regarding that paper is the question at issue. Mr. Macdonald has been fair enough to say that he does not believe that any press censorship should be exercised. Very good, but when a federal law forbids the circulation through the mails of certain publications, does not the enforcement of that law establish a press censorship? When a state law forbids agents and newsboys to sell the same or other publications, has not a press censorship been established? Mr. Macdonald's entire argument hinges upon the question of libel. But there is nothing about libel in these obnoxious statutes, state or federal. There is no question of personal injury, which is the justification of the law of libel, in any of these "obscenity" and "sensational" enactments. Of course Mr. Macdonald is aware of this fact, but in his just indignation against such papers as the Sun he seems to hav momentarily forgotten it. He knows that the law of libel is general in its application and that the proprietors of the Sun are as fully amenable to its provisions as are the proprietors of THE TRUTH SEEKER or the World. Why, then, seek to defend this special, this dangerous, this invasiv legislation? Had Mr. Swartz been arrested upon the complaint of any person who had been libeled, or claimed to hav been libeled, by the Sun, the question of the liberty of the press would not hav been involved. It would hav been simply a question of fact—Did this article or these articles libel the plaintiff, and is Clarence Swartz, as circulator of the paper, partially or wholly responsible to said complainant for the injury done him? Mr. Macdonald says that Mr. Swartz "ought to be buried a mile deep under libel suits" if the Sun is the kind of paper it is charged with being. What has this to do with my contention in regard to the relativ harmfulness of federal and state statutes aimed at the freedom of the press? If Mr. Swartz has libeled anyone there is a law in the state of Kansas against libel, and he is no more exempt from its penalties than is any other citizen. But Mr. Swartz has not been prosecuted for libel, and so what is the use of dragging the law of libel into this discussion? If Mr. Swartz is prosecuted under that law and if we cry out against the prosecution as a blow at the liberty of the press or the inviolability of the mails, it will be in order for Mr. Macdonald to ask us to show wherein the liberty of the press or the inviolability of the mails is imperiled by such prosecution. But at present the introduction of the question of libel is premature and wholly out of place. If Mr. Somerby should be arrested under the Sunday law, and Mr. Macdonald should—as he would—protest against the arrest as a blow aimed at the religious liberty of the citizen, it would hardly be fair or sensible for me to remark that Mr. Somerby had injured other people by what he had done and now "gets nothing more than he deserves." Mr. Macdonald would be very likely to answer my objection in some such conclusiv manner as this: "It may all be as you assert that Mr. Somerby has invaded the rights of some person or persons. Very well; there are general laws that apply to such offenses. Let the injured party or parties make due complaint. It will be then simply a question of fact to be determined in the usual way. What I object to is this special, dangerous, partisan, invasiv Sunday law. It is a deceitful thing, a cover under which to accomplish the destruction of the religious liberty of all who are obnoxious to the dominant powers in church and state."

There is one sentence in the closing paragraph of Mr. Macdonald's article which I may be pardoned for quoting and changing slightly. He says: "It is true that all governments do injustice, but that is owing to the bigotry, dishonesty, and tyrannical nature of the human beings who administer them." It seems to me that this statement which I am going to make more nearly covers the ground and more clearly indicates the cure for or the modification of existing evils: It is true that all individuals will do injustice when vested with irresponsible power, and this irresponsible power and the consequent injustice are never at their maximum except when these individuals are banded together as a government, of which government the most bigoted, dishonest, and tyrannical of said individuals nearly always manage to become the administrators. The People Out West.

Away up in this great Northwest, some twelve hundred miles from my home, I feel like talking awhile with the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER. If some of them, those who judge the world's size by our small Eastern states, could for once look upon some parts of this great West, could breathe the bracing air of these immense prairies, or climb some of the bluffs on either side of the Missouri river and then as far as the eye can reach see in the frequent canyons the immense farms, some of them with one cornfield large enough to make a dozen Eastern farms, I think it would hav a tendency to enlarge their ideas. I hav just returned to this place (Orange City) from a visit to another county, where I went to visit an invalid friend whom I had not seen in the last thirty years. She married into the Day family, of Hallowell, Me. The father was one of the earliest Garrisonian Abolitionists, taking the Liberator in the years when to own a copy of the Liberator was as much a disgrace as to subscribe for Lucifer is to day; and had the church and the Whig party (that was the name of the Republican party then) been able to find a Wanamaker, and a man as destitute of the decency of knowledge as Comstock, to define law and execute its demands, this Liberator would hav been shut out of the mails. Mr. Day was also a Universalist.

An Infidel is more respectable to-day than a Universalist sixty or seventy years ago. I hav no doubt the Universalist Trumpet would hav been forbidden the mails then had there been men learned enough to interpret the law. Mr. Day early settled in Iowa, and he with his family suffered as pioneers all did and must who go beyond the limits of civilization. The township bears the name of Kennebeck, in remembrance of the old home in Maine. There are several families of the name of Day whom I met, and though they are not all as pronounced in their Infidelity as my friends Mr. and Mrs. Preston Day, they read THE TRUTH SEEKER and Freethinkers' Magazine and surely influence the community in favor of Liberalism.

I am spending the summer with friends, young friends whom I hav known only three years, but who by their activ generosity make me feel that the observation, "See how these Christians love one another," would be quite as true if the word "Freethinker" were substituted for "Christian." Young people cannot be expected to know how more than pleasant it is to the old, those who hav had many friends but who hav year by year seen them laid under the sod, to find the young appreciativ of the claims of friendship.

I saw to-day in Freethought a notice of the death of Mrs. T. C. Leland. I once entertained a few days, with a son and daughter, the daughter now Mrs. Macdonald. My remembrance of her is pleasant. Mrs. Leland was surely too young to die, but alas! death cares for naught. LUCY N. COLMAN.

Mrs. Slenker Among the Superstitious.

Dear friends, I am still enjoying my visit here, and wishing to share the pleasure with you, I giv you now and then a glimpse of the scenes as they come and go. Last evening Dr. De Garmo was invited to attend the grand exhibition of the pupils of St. Joachim's school at Mattewan, and to bring his family. So four of us went. Getting there too early, we were taken by the priest to the parsonage to spend the waiting moments, and then two of the holy (!) fathers escorted us to the church, and gave us good seats where we could best see the performance. It seemed odd to think of a noted Infidel and Atheist hobnobbing in this way with noted Catholic priests; but it all comes of being a family connection of a professor with a big long string of decorations to his name. The exhibition was the finest I ever attended. The children were so perfectly drilled, and so beautifully dressed, and did their parts so well. There was a floral tableau that was the prettiest thing I ever saw, and it contained some of the finest posturing. The long floral arches which the girls held in their hands looked like ornamental jumping ropes, or ropes made of flowers; and as they rose and fell and waved to and fro one could hardly decide which were the prettier, the bright smiling faces of the little girls or the lovely flowers. The "dance of the fairies" in "Little Red Riding Hood," it seems to me, could not be surpassed anywhere. The tots of girls with dew-bespangled white dresses, enwreathed with green vines and lovely flowers, made spectators almost fancy themselvs in some quiet woodland nook watching an actual fairy dance. The disappointed wolf goes howling back to his den and the fairies save Little Red Riding Hood, thus making a better ending of the story than we used to hav in our young days. Half a dozen little boys dressed as Chinamen gave a song that was "too funny for anything." The whole of the exercises were beautiful and entertaining, and mostly secular, and if I could hav disassociated it from Catholicism it would hav been an unmixed and unalloyed pleasuring. But it seemed so sadly serious to think of all those lovely children being dosed and drugged with the old myths, and bound so firmly in ecclesiastical chains that would cling to them their whole lives, that it greatly shadowed and clouded the otherwise glad and joyous panorama. Every rose has its thorn and life has no unmixed joys, so we will accept what comes, doing our little best to increase the good and diminish the evil.

AUNT ELMINA.

Fishkill on Hudson, N. Y., July 3, 291.

Lectures and Meetings.

W. S. BELL is now visiting his son and family in Brooklyn, N. Y., and is open for engagements to lecture in New Jersey, New York, and New England. His address is 654 Monroe street, Brooklyn, N. Y.

THE Radical Club will giv a special entertainment and reception at its rooms, 37 Clinton place, on Saturday eve, July 11th, on which occasion there will be a very brief address by Mr. Wakeman on "The History and Evolution of Art and Music," followed by a varied program illustrating their development in the different nationalities. The first attempt of the Club in this line was voted a success, and the next is sure to be better. The admission will be by ticket, 25 cents.

IF you do not giv your fellow-men the truth, whatever else you giv them is of little avail.—Miss Hill.

Ingersoll on Creeds.

From the Morning Advertiser.

Whatever may be said of his belief in revealed religion, Robert G. Ingersoll is respected by all intellectual antagonists for thorough sincerity, absolute fairness in debate, and unquestionable ability in the presentation of his argument.

His views, therefore, on the recent attitude of the general assembly at Detroit in the case of Dr. Briggs, the alleged heretical utterances of the Rev. Heber Newton, and the desertion of one creed for another by the Rev. Dr. Bridgman, are of peculiar interest just at this time. Colonel Ingersoll has just returned from a trip to the West, and in speaking of these incidents he said:

"There is a natural desire on the part of every intelligent human being to harmonize his information—to make his theories agree—in other words, to make what he knows, or thinks he knows, in one department agree with and harmonize with what he knows in every other department of human knowledge.

"The human race has not advanced in line, neither has it advanced in all departments with the same rapidity. It is with the race as it is with an individual. A man may turn his entire attention to some one subject—as, for instance, to geology—and neglect other sciences. He may be a good geologist but an exceedingly poor astronomer; or he may know nothing of politics or of political economy. So he may be a successful statesman and know nothing of theology. But if a man, successful in one direction, takes up some other question, he is bound to use the knowledge he has on one subject as a kind of standard to measure what he is told on some other subject. If he is a chemist, it will be natural for him, when studying some other question, to use what he knows in chemistry—that is to say, he will expect to find cause, and everywhere succession and resemblance. He will say: It must be in all other sciences as in chemistry—there must be no chance. The elements hav no caprice. Iron is always the same. Gold does not change. Prussic acid is always poison—it has no freaks. So he will reason as to all facts in nature. He will be a believer in the atomic integrity of all matter, in the persistence of gravitation. Being so trained and so convinced, his tendency will be to weigh what is called new information in the same scales that he has been using.

"Now for the application of this. Progress in religion is the slowest, because man is kept back by sentimentality, by the efforts of parents, by old associations. A thousand unseen tendrils are twining about him that he must necessarily break if he advances. In other departments of knowledge inducements are held out and rewards are promised to the one who does succeed—to the one who really does advance—to the man who discovers new facts. But in religion, instead of rewards being promised, threats are made. The man is told that he must not advance—that if he takes a step forward it is at the peril of his soul; that if he thinks and investigates he is in danger of exciting the wrath of God. Consequently religion has been of the slowest growth. Now, in most departments of knowledge man has advanced; and coming back to the original statement—a desire to harmonize all that we know—there is a growing desire on the part of intelligent men to hav a religion fit to keep company with the other sciences.

"Our creeds were made in times of ignorance. They suited very well a flat world, and a God who lived in the sky just above us, and who used the lightning to destroy his enemies. This God was regarded much as a savage regarded the head of his tribe—as one having the right to reward and punish. And this God, being much greater than a chief of the tribe, could giv greater rewards and inflict greater punishments. They knew that the ordinary chief, or the ordinary king, punished the slightest offenses with death. They also knew that these chiefs and kings tortured their victims as long as the victims could bear the torture. So when they described their God, they gave to this God power to keep the tortured victim alive forever—because they knew that the earthly chief or the earthly king would prolong the life of the tortured for the sake of increasing the agonies of the victim. In those savage days they regarded punishment as the only means of protecting society. In consequence of this they built heaven and hell on an earthly plan, and they put God—that is to say the chief, that is to say the king—on a throne like an earthly king.

"Of course, these views were all ignorant and barbaric; but in that blessed day their geology and astronomy were on a par with their theology. There was a harmony in all departments of knowledge, or rather of ignorance. Since that time there has been a great advance made in the idea of government—the old idea being that the right to do came from God and the king, and from the king to the people. Now intelligent people believe that the source of authority has been changed, and that all just powers of government are derived from the consent of the governed. So there has been a great advance in the philosophy of punishment—in the treatment of criminals. So, too, in all the sciences. The earth is no longer flat; heaven is not immediately above us; the universe has been infinitly enlarged, and we hav at last found that our earth is but a grain of sand, a speck on the great shores of the infinit. Consequently there is a discrepancy, a discord, a contradiction between our theology and the other sciences. Men of intelligence feel this. Dr. Briggs concluded that a perfectly good and intelligent God could not hav created billions of sentient beings knowing that they were to be eternally miserable. No man could do such a thing, had he the power, without being infinitly malicious. Dr. Briggs began to hav a little hope for the human race—began to think that maybe God is better than the creed describes him.

"And right here it may be well enough to remark that no one has ever been declared a heretic for thinking God bad. Heresy has consisted in thinking God better than the church said he was. The man who said God will damn nearly everybody was orthodox. The man who said God will save everybody was denounced as a blaspheming wretch, as one who assailed and maligned the character of God. I can remember when the Universalists were denounced as vehemently and maliciously as the Atheists are today.

"Now," continued Colonel Ingersoll, "Dr. Briggs is undoubtedly an intelligent man. He knows that nobody on the earth knows who wrote the five books of Moses. He knows that they were not written until hundreds of years after Moses was dead. He knows that two or more persons were the authors of Isaiah. He knows that David did not write to exceed three or four of the Psalms. He knows that the book of Job is not a Jewish book. He knows that the Songs of Solomon were not written by Solomon. He knows that the book of Ecclesiastes was written by a Freethinker. He also knows that there is not in existence to-day—so far as anybody knows—any of the manuscripts of the Old or New Testaments.

"So about the New Testament. Dr. Briggs knows that nobody livs who has ever seen an original manuscript, or who ever saw anybody that did see one, or that claims to hav seen one. He knows that nobody knows who wrote Matthew, or Mark, or Luke, or John. He knows that John did not write John, and that gospel was not written until long after John was dead. He knows that no one knows who wrote the Hebrews. He also knows that the book of Revelation is an insane production. Dr. Briggs also knows the way in which these books came to be canonical, and he knows that the way was no more binding than a resolution passed by a political convention.

"He also knows that many books were left out that had for centuries equal authority with those that were put in. He also knows that many passages—and the very passages upon which many churches are founded—are interpolations. He knows that the last chapter of Mark, beginning with the sixteenth verse to the end, is an interpolation; and he also knows that neither Matthew, nor Mark, nor Luke ever said one word about the necessity of believing on the Lord Jesus Christ or of believing anything—not one word about believing in the Bible or joining the church or doing any particular thing in the way of ceremony to insure salvation. He knows that according to Matthew, God agreed to forgiv others. Consequently he knows that there is not one particle of what is called modern theology in Matthew, Mark, or Luke. He knows that the trouble commenced in John, and that John was not written until probably one hundred and fifty years—possibly two hundred years—after Christ was dead. So he also knows that the sin against the Holy Ghost is an interpolation; that "I came not to bring peace but a sword," if not an interpolation, is an absolute contradiction. So, too, he knows that the promis to forgiv in heaven what the disciples should forgiv on earth, is an interpolation; and if it is not an interpolation, it is without the slightest sense in fact.

"Knowing these things, and knowing, in addition to what I hav stated, that there are thirty thousand or forty thousand mistakes in the Old Testament, that there are a great many contradictions and absurdities, that many of the laws are cruel and infamous, and could hav been made only by a barbarous people, Dr. Briggs has concluded that, after all, the torch that sheds the serenest and divinest light is the human reason, and that we must investigate the Bible as we do other books. At least, I suppose he has reached some such conclusion. He may imagin that the pure gold of inspiration still runs through the quartz and porphyry of ignorance and mistake, and that all we hav to do is to extract the shining metal by some process that may be called theological smelting; and if so I hav no fault to find. Dr. Briggs has taken a step in advance—that is to say the tree is growing, and when the tree grows the bark splits; when the new leaves come the old leaves are rotting on the ground.

"The Presbyterian creed is a very bad creed. It has been the stumbling-block, not only of the head, but of the heart, for many generations. I do not know that it is, in fact, worse than any other orthodox creed; but the bad features are stated with an explicitness and emphasized with a candor that render the creed absolutely appalling. It is amazing to me that any man ever wrote it, or that any set of men ever produced it. It is more amazing to me that any human being ever believed it. It is still more amazing that any human being thought it wicked not to believe it. It is more amazing still than all the others combined that any human being ever wanted it to be true.

"This creed is a relic of the Middle Ages. It has in it the malice, the malicious logic, the total depravity, the utter heartlessness of John Calvin, and it gives me a great pleasure to say that no Presbyterian was ever so bad as his creed. And here let me say, as I hav said many times, that I do not hate Presbyterians—because among them I count some of my best friends—but I hate Presbyterianism. And I cannot illustrate this any better than by saying, I do not hate a man because he has the rheumatism, but I hate the rheumatism because it has a man.

"The Presbyterian church is growing, and is growing because, as I said at first, there is a universal tendency in the mind of a man to harmonize all that he knows or thinks he knows. This growth may be delayed. The bud of heresy may be kept back by the north wind of Princeton and by the early frost called Patton. In spite of these souvenirs of the Dark Ages the church must continue to grow. The theologians who regard theology as something higher than a trade tend toward Liberalism. Those who regard preaching as a business, and the inculcation of sentiment as a trade, will stand by the lowest possible views. They will cling to the letter and throw away the spirit. They prefer the dead limb to a new bud or to a new leaf. They want no more sap. They delight in the dead tree, in its unbending nature, and they mistake the stiffness of death for the vigor and resistance of life.

"Now, as with Dr. Briggs, so with Dr. Bridgman, although it seems to me that he has simply jumped from the frying-pan into the fire; and why he should prefer the Episcopal creed to the Baptist is more than I can imagin. The Episcopal creed is, in fact, just as bad as the Presbyterian. It calmly and with unruffled brow utters the sentence of eternal punishment on the majority of the human race, and the Episcopalian expects to be happy in heaven with his son or his daughter, or his mother or his wife, in hell.

"Dr. Bridgman will find himself exactly in the position of the Rev. Mr. Newton, provided he expresses his thought. But I account for the Bridgmans and Newtons by the fact there is still sympathy in the human heart, and that there is still intelligence in the human brain. For my part I am glad to see this growth in the orthodox churches, and the quicker they revise their creeds the better. I oppose nothing that is good in any creed—I attack only that which is only ignorant, cruel, and absurd, and I make the attack in the interest of human liberty and for the sake of human happiness.

"What do you think of the action of the Presbyterian general assembly at Detroit, and what effect do you think it will hav on the religious growth?" was asked.

"That general assembly was controled by the orthodox within the church," replied Colonel Ingersoll, "by the strict constructionists and by the Calvinists; by the gentlemen who not only believe the creed, not only believe that a vast majority of people are going to hell, but are really glad of it; by gentlemen who, when they feel a little blue, read about total depravity to cheer up, and when they think of the mercy of God as exhibited in their salvation, and the justice of God as illustrated by the damnation of others, their hearts burst into a kind of efflorescence of joy.

"These gentlemen are opposed to all kinds of amusements except reading the Bible, the Confession of Faith, and the creed, and listening to Presbyterian sermon and prayers. All these things they regard as the food of cheerfulness. They warn the elect against theaters and operas, dancing, and games of chance.

"Well, if their doctrin is true, there ought to be no theaters, except exhibitions of hell; there ought to be no operas, except where the music is a succession of wails for the misfortunes of man. If their doctrin is true, I do not see how any human being could ever smile again—I do not see how a mother could welcome her babe; everything in nature would become hateful; flowers and sunshine would simply tell us of our fate.

"My doctrin is exactly the opposit of this. Let us enjoy ourselvs every moment that we can. The love of the dramatic is universal. The stage has not simply amused, but it has elevated mankind. The greatest genius of our world poured the treasures of his soul into the drama. I do not believe that any girl can be corrupted, or that any man can be injured, by becoming acquainted with Isabella, or Miranda, or Juliet, or Imogen, or any of the great heroins of Shakspere.

"So I regard the opera as one of the great civilizers. No one can listen to the symphonies of Beethoven or the music of Schubert, without receiving a benefit. And no one can hear the operas of Wagner without feeling that he has been ennobled and refined.

"Why is it the Presbyterians are so opposed to music in this world, and yet expect to hav so much in heaven? Is not music just as demoralizing in the sky as on the earth, and does anybody believe that Abraham, or Isaac, or Jacob, ever played any music compared to Wagner?

"Why should we postpone our joy to another world? Thousands of people take great pleasure in dancing, and I let them dance. Dancing is better than weeping and wailing over a theology born of ignorance and superstition.

"And so with games of chance. There is a certain pleasure in playing games, and the pleasure is of the most innocent character. Let all these games be played at home and children will not prefer the saloon to the society of their parents. I believe in cards and billiards, and would believe in progressiv eucher were it more of a game—the great objection to it is its lack of complexity. My idea is to get what little happiness you can get out of this life, and to enjoy all sunshine that breaks through the clouds of misfortune. Life is poor enough at best. No one should fail to pick up every jewel of joy that can be found in his path. Everyone should be as happy as he can, provided he is not happy at the expense of another, and no person rightly constituted can be happy at the expense of another.

"So let us get all we can of good between the cradle and the grave—all that we can of the truly dramatic, all we can of music, all we can of art, all we can of enjoyment; and if, when death comes, that is the end, we hav at least made the best of this life, and if there be another life, let us make the best of that.

"I am doing what little I can to hasten the coming of the day when the human race will enjoy liberty—not simply of body, but liberty of mind. And by liberty of mind I mean freedom from superstition, and, added to that, the intelligence to find out the conditions of happiness; and added to that, the wisdom to liv in accordance with those conditions."

A Prohibitionist Meets a Christian Relativ of Colonel Ingersoll.

Charles C. Moore, Editor Blue Grass Blade.

This time the joke is on me, but I am going to tell it all the same.

You know I hav had a peck of trouble because I will back old Brother Bob Ingersoll, and I reckon I hav suffered more for my religion, considering the amount of it that I hav on hand, than any man in the United States.

They hav caught up with Blaine, and Cleveland, and old Brother Beecher in little "nest-hiding" jobs; Talmage was once arraigned by his church under the charge of lying, and Sam Small has lately been in hot water under the charge of shortage of public funds; but when it comes to old Colonel Bob, everybody that knows anything about him says that he givs to the poor, is the champion of overworked factory girls, that he is a good husband, a good father, good citizen, good lawyer, great orator, funny, jolly man, who pays his debts and doesn't swindle anybody or steal anybody's money, and the only charge they hav against him is that he says what he thinks and thinks what he pleases, and wants everybody else to do the same.

I don't think that is a description of a bad citizen, by a jug full, and I don't propose to fall in with the boot-licking gang of newspapers that vilify him because they think it's popular to do so, when every one of them would quit it and go to lecturing just like old Colonel Bob is doing if they thought they could make half the money the colonel is making.

People that don't like my newspaper because it talks this way don't hav to read it.

The other day when I was down in Knoxville, the fact that I was the guest of the president of the university gave me the entree to the biggest bugs in the town (they never saw me plowing corn with a mule on Sunday), and I was invited to take a seat upon the stage in the opera house with the heavy swells during the exercises of commencement day.

While in the flies I was introduced to a number of gentlemen, among others to Judge H. H. Ingersoll, dean of the university, as I subsequently saw on the program. I saw at a glance that he was a man of rare attractivness in person, manner, and attainments. He had an elaborate mannerism with an entrancing ingenuousness.

Mannerism to me is like the > Little girl that had a little curl

> That hung right down on her forehead.
> When it is good, it's very good indeed,
> But when it is bad it is horrid.

That of the judge is surpassingly fine.

I had once met Colonel Bob Ingersoll, and the personal appearance and distinguished kindness and suavity of the judge, in addition to the fact that the name is unusual, strongly impressed me that the judge and the colonel were relativs. So I said to the judge, "I hav an acquaintance, and I believe I may say a friend, of your name, but his first name is Robert G."

"Oh, yes," said the judge, "he is the friend of everybody." And he then told me that he was a cousin of Colonel Ingersoll, and had visited him and had immensely enjoyed his society.

It flashed over my mind that this interview was going to make more trouble for the Blade. I was going to say something about it in my paper. I was going to be honest and tell my readers how I had been attracted to Judge Ingersoll, and about how he knew his cousin Bob, and was in sympathy with him, and then I was going to talk to the judge and get some of his religious opinions, and people would say that my admiration for the judge and my alleged discovery of his resemblance to "Pagan Bob" was another way that I was getting in a puff for the arch-heretic and his religion.

But I said to myself I was going to say it all the same.

After the exercises were over Judge Ingersoll came with Dr. Dabney, the president of the university, to me to say that he should be pleased to hav us to supper that night.

The judge is also a professor in the law department, and it is his custom to entertain the graduates of the law department at his house the evening of each commencement day, and they and the president and I constituted the guests of the evening.

On arriving at the house, a gem of a home in a handsome suburb, the judge presented me to his wife, and daughter of twenty-two years, their only child, and one of the most magnificent instances of womanly development, physically, intellectually, and in the angelic peculiarities of womanhood, that I hav ever seen. She confessed to being five feet ten, and wanted to hold the heel of a "golden slipper" to climb them golden stairs—responsible for an inordinate share of that, but I am hardly an inch below six feet and she looked as tall as I am.

I looked at her and thought, in the possibly irreverent but certainly knightly sentiment of her distinguished kinsman, that "when God made a woman out of a bone, considering the raw material he had on hand, it was the best job he ever did."

And when I saw what a specimen of womanly health she was I thought of old Colonel Bob's suggestion that if he had had the framing of the universe he "would hav made good health catching instead of disease."

The judge's beautiful deportment to his wife and daughter reminded me of that I had seen in Colonel Bob.

I became so delightfully engaged in conversation with the young lady that I felt like it beat the heretical conversation that I had anticipated with such interest, and I concluded to defer the latter until after supper.

The judge all the time was being a magnificent host, and was full of wit and wisdom. He had been in Lexington and had met Breckinridge, Blackburn, Beck, and Buckner, a "whole hive of big B's," as he expressed it, and his kindly comments upon them were so in contrast with some things I hav said about them, that he unconsciously got it in for me good.

After a while we were invited into an elegant supper, and an incident occurred that stunned me.

When we all stood at the back of our chairs waiting for a half minute the invitation to be seated, he bowed his head in a most beautifully reverential manner, and thanked God for all these good things we were going to eat, and in another minute he was entertaining me, whom he had honored with a seat at his right, with something just as funny as when his cousin Bob told me about "Noah's ark" at the breakfast table, as I hav told you before.

Of course that incident knocked all of my purposes of heretical conversation with the judge higher than a kite, and I never mentioned theology to him.

But I did hav a daisy time with that pretty girl the rest of that evening.

But you would hav laughed if you could hav heard us when we locked horns on woman suffrage; I, a man, defending it, and she, a woman, against it.

I didn't know whether to think it an instance of gallantry or not in those young lawyers, but every rascal of them was on the girl's side, and they would hav snowed me under if I had not been right and all of them wrong.

But there's a moral to this story. I hav learned something on my side and I want you all to do the same on your side.

I found out that the fact that a man is bright, and jolly, and smart, and kind, and hospitable, and named Ingersoll, does not prove that he is an Infidel, and that he can be all of these things and be a Christian.

Now, the thing I want you to learn is that when a man is all of these nice things and is named Ingersoll, and is an Infidel, he is not a bad man.

If there is a just God in heaven he is not going to reward or punish men for what they believe. That does not amount to a hill of beans. It is what he does that counts.

I hav been the guest of both Judge H. H. Ingersoll, and of Colonel Robert G. Ingersoll. They treated me precisely the same way, and as far as I can see, or anybody else can see, one is just as honest as the other.

If there is any God and is any heaven, and by some sort of a streak of luck I should happen to get there, I shall be just as glad to meet one of the Ingersolls as the other, and if anybody has to go to hell I hope it will be some of these durned old hypocritical preachers and newspaper editors whose religion is to blast Bob Ingersoll, and whose politics is to vote for whisky.

That Cryptogram.

Those who too readily swallow the assertion that no such person as the Shakspere so familiar to us ever existed hav this insuperable difficulty in their way, that few men ever lived who were better known to their time or more admired by their intimates than that same Bill Shakspere—known and admired too for the very qualities discovered on intimate acquaintance that might be expected of such an author. Ben Jonson knew both Shakspere and Bacon and has given us his opinion of both. We hav the direct testimony of several persons to the fact that such a man lived and was well known to all who met him as the Shakspere of history and tradition. Some of his daily companions and intimates incidentally made mention of him in writings that hav survived, and always with admiration, sometimes lively, sometimes mixed with awe. And when he came to die the greatest of his time spake of him as never before man spoke of man, and some who did so were his daily intimates. And years afterward the grandchildren of these contemporaries spoke and wrote of Shakspere, the man whom their fathers knew, in just such terms as we might expect. Milton may hav seen Shakspere, and must hav known many of his intimates. See how he writes of him. So of many others. To deny that such a man as our Shakspere ever lived is to deny all evidence in the ordinary acceptation of the term.

On the other hand, there are those who ridicule and sneer at the cryptogram theory, and do so with just as little use of reason. They do not investigate. A large number of capable persons hav examined the matter carefully and declare there is some story interwoven among some of the plays. Whoever has examined the edition in controversy in the light of a few of the hints given by Donnelly must conclude, if he be at all candid and capable, that it would be the greatest miracle of time if by a mere accident all the letters, words, and figures in controversy were placed as they are. Such a coincidence never occurred by chance—could not in millions of ages of publishing. As Donnelly truly says, the letters of the alphabet promiscuously thrown on the floor are just as likely to arrange themselvs into one of Shakspere's plays.

Those who deny that there is any ground for the cryptogram theory are just as rash as those who assert that the Shakspere of the plays was "a poor puppet—a gorbellied, drunken nobody." What then? We venture to say that this controversy will continue, the story of the cryptogram will finally be adopted, and that the name and fame of Bacon will by no means be increased. His character will be made blacker than as drawn by Macaulay. The grandest of all the ideas in his greatest works were stolen from Roger Bacon. That has been proved more than once, but the glory still clings to Francis Bacon's fame. If it shall be proved by the issue of this controversy, that so contemptible a poet and dramatist as the author of a few verses paraphrasing Job and Psalms, and of "A Holy War," passed his last days of enforced retirement for high crimes in trying to steal the glory of another man through an edition of his works by interweaving the cryptogram and its monstrous story, his name will be consigned to eternal infamy.

How to Help The Truth Seeker.

1. When renewing get a friend to subscribe and thus save a half dollar apiece.

2. Get your newsdealer to display it on his stand or in his shop window. Be sure that he displays the pictures.

3. Get your newsdealer to keep in stock one or more copies, with your guarantee to take off his hands at the end of the week any that remain unsold. If he exhibits them the pictures alone will sell them.

4. Take a few extra copies and circulate them among your acquaintances. On your request, we will send you back-number sample copies free.

5. Leave a copy occasionally where it will be picked up—in the train, in the factory, in the meeting-room, in the cigar store, in the barber-shop. Leave it picture-side up.

6. Keep in your pocket some of our cheap tracts, and when convenient hand one to a friend.

7. Get a new subscriber by persuading some friend to take it.

Two of Colonel Ingersoll's Critics.

We do not believe that the "labor reformers" of this country and Canada will make headway for their cause by following the lead of the Toronto Labor Advocate in abusing Col. Robert G. Ingersoll as a "shallow phrase monger" and a willing hired advocate of the "privileged classes," notwithstanding the echoing of the Advocate's sheet-iron thunder by Mr. B. R. Tucker, self-elected spokesman of "Philosophical Anarchy" and self-appointed corrector of the human race.

The diatribe of the Labor Advocate, substantially repeated by Mr. Tucker, was caused by Colonel Ingersoll's article in the North American Review in reply to General Hawkins, a good epitome of which was published in THE TRUTH SEEKER last week. We hope everyone will read it, as no doubt he will, and send for the Review and peruse it entire. Then judge if Mr. Phillips Thomson and Mr. B. R. Tucker can find any justification for their characterization of its author as an enemy of the workingman, and for saying, as does the Advocate, approvingly reprinted by Mr. Tucker, that Colonel Ingersoll is "posing as a champion of the very worst abuses and villanies of the age, and bringing his undoubted eloquence and argumentativ power to justify the wholesale robbery of the people by railroads and the manifold rascalities of the competitiv system," or if there be any truth in the assertion that "he makes great professions of Liberalism, but somehow on every practical question he is always found in alliance with the capitalistic, corrupt, or reactionary elements—the champion of the privileges of wealth and vested wrong—whether as corporation lawyer, campaign speaker, or magazine writer."

So far from the truth are these assertions that it is mild language to call them lies. On the labor question Colonel Ingersoll has always talked common sense, which to some "reformers" is exceedingly objectionable. He is not an Anarchist, as he knows that government is necessary. He is not a Socialist, for he believes in individual liberty. And because he is neither of these, both unite in denouncing him, and Christian and Infidel "reformers" in Toronto and Boston, Socialistic and Anarchistic, bury their mutual hatred long enough to wag malicious tongues at a man too big for them to comprehend. But Colonel Ingersoll's sympathies for the oppressed, for the poor, the victims of environments and heredity, the robbed producers of wealth, the real pushers-on of civilization, will not be lessened by such attacks, nor will those who hav read him be deceived thereby.

Colonel Ingersoll has given his views on social matters to the world in many interviews and in some speeches. His "hobby," as he calls it, on the "land question," was ridden at the banquet in Montana only a few weeks ago. And if anyone can find in that hobby any leaning toward capitalistic corruption, or defense of the "privileges of wealth" to monopolize the ground, or fear of "vested wrong," he must hav the most wonderful eyesight ever given to man. It is in THE TRUTH SEEKER of June 27th; read it. Every one of our readers, too, will remember his "Lay Sermon" to the Secular Union, in which he considered the inequality of conditions now existing, and from which it is evident that his sympathies are with just the opposit "classes" to the one alleged by the Toronto Socialist and echoed by the Boston Anarchist. Read some of his paragraphs: "I propose," he began, "to say a few words upon subjects that are near to us all, and in which every human being ought to be interested—and if he is not, it may be that his wife will be, it may be that his orphans will be; and I would like to see this world, at last, so that a man could die and not feel that he left his wife and children a prey to the greed, the avarice, or the cruelties of mankind. There is something wrong in a government where they who do the most hav the least. There is something wrong, when honesty wears a rag, and rascality a robe; when the loving, the tender, eat a crust, while the infamous sit at banquets. I cannot do much, but I can at least sympathize with those who suffer."

"My sympathies are with the poor. My sympathies are with the workingmen of the United States. Understand me distinctly. I am not an Anarchist. Anarchy is the reaction from tyranny. I am not a Socialist. I am not a Communist. I am an Individualist. I do not believe in tyranny of government, but I do believe in justice as between man and man."

"No man should be allowed to own any land that he does not use. Everybody knows that—I do not care whether he has thousands or millions. I hav owned a great deal of land, but I know just as well as I know that I am living that I should not be allowed to hav it unless I use it. And why? Don't you know that if people could bottle the air, they would? Don't you know that there would be an American Air-bottling Association? And don't you know that they would allow thousands and millions to die for want of breath, if they could not pay for air? I am not blaming anybody. I am just telling how it is. Now, the land belongs to the children of Nature. Nature invites into this world every babe that is born. And what would you think of me, for instance, to-night, if I had invited you here—nobody had charged you anything, but you had been invited—and when you got here you had found one man pretending to occupy a hundred seats, another fifty, and another seventy-five, and thereupon you were compelled to stand up—what would you think of the invitation? It seems to me that every child of Nature is entitled to his share of the land, and that he should not be compelled to beg the privilege to work the soil, of a babe that happened to be born before him. And why do I say this? Because it is not to our interest to hav a few landlords and millions of tenants."

These indicate clearly enough where the sympathies of the great Agnostic are, but because he has the modesty of great genius, and does not pretend to be able to rebuild the universe on a specified and perfect plan, these little people, so short-sighted that they cannot see their own limitations, jump around and call him "shallow." If the monumental impudence of their act ever occurs to them, how small they will feel! In that same "Lay Sermon," he said these common-sense things—and it is perhaps because they are so true that the closet doctrinaires dislike to hear them: "What remedy, then, is there? First, the great weapon in this country is the ballot. Each voter is a sovereign. There the poorest is the equal of the richest. His vote will count just as many as though the hand that cast it controled millions. The poor are in the majority in this country. If there is any law that oppresses them, it is their fault. They hav followed the fife and drum of some party. They hav been misled by others. No man should go an inch with a party—no matter if that party is half the world and has in it the greatest intellects of the earth—unless that party is going his way. No honest man should ever turn round to join anything. If it overtakes him, good. But do not go with anything that is not going your way, no matter whether they call it Republican, or Democrat, or Progressiv Democracy—do not go with it unless it goes your way.

"The ballot is the power. The law should settle many of these questions between capital and labor. But I expect the greatest good to come from civilization, from the growth of a sense of justice; for I tell you, to-night, a civilized man will never want anything for less than it is worth—a civilized man, when he sells a thing, will never want more than it is worth—a really and truly civilized man would rather be cheated than to cheat. And yet, in the United States, good as we are, nearly everybody wants to get everything for a little less than it is worth, and this breeds rascality on both sides. That ought to be done away with. There is one step toward it that we will take: we will finally say that human flesh, human labor, shall not depend entirely on 'supply and demand.' That is infinitly cruel. Every man should giv to another according to his ability to giv—and enough that he may make his living and lay something by for the winter of old age."

There is small hope of getting the envious and dishonest social critics of Colonel Ingersoll to do him justice, but at least they should know what he said on the subjects they write around.

Henry Ward Beecher.

The unveiling of a statue of Brooklyn's late famous heretical preacher has induced several ministers to use him for a text, and to try to tell what kind of a man and preacher he was. One of Brooklyn's present preachers, the Rev. A. C. Dixon, but not famous, made some very plain remarks on the subject in a sermon in which he sought to explain Mr. Beecher's position, but he did not advance the true explanation of Beecher's extraordinary changes, though he described them pretty accurately. "In Mr. Beecher's early ministry," said Mr. Dixon, "he was a teacher. He believed the Bible and proclaimed it as the revelation of God with no uncertain accent. But in his later ministry it was almost impossible to learn just what he believed as to the inspiration of the scripture, future punishment, the atonement, etc. At times he seemed to be orthodox, then Unitarian, then again Universalist. He declared that his best friends failed to understand him; and no wonder. The sermon of the day seemed to contradict the sermon of last week. Some one said: 'The word is now composed of believers, unbelievers, and Beecherites.' The Henry Ward Beecher of old age almost demolished the strong Henry Ward Beecher of former days."

One explanation of this Mr. Dixon had from members of Plymouth church, to the effect that after the nervous strain of the great trial, in which he bore himself so nobly, he was not just what he was before. "I hav it on good authority," said Mr. Dixon, "that such was the opinion of some prominent membsrs of Plymouth church and that it made them generous toward the inconsistencies and vagaries of his preaching in his later days. Some of his best friends thought him at times hardly responsible for what he said or did."

But this is not Mr. Dixon's own opinion. "The true explanation of this change," he continued, "seems to me to lie in Mr. Beecher's sensitivness to environment, and the fact that in his early days he studied the Bible, while in his latter days he gave most of his time to the study of contemporaneous literature, the spirit of which was largely antibiblical. It is evident that Mr. Beecher in preparing his sermons on evolution read Herbert Spencer more than he did Moses. He was always a man of the times in the sense that he was in sympathy with living men about him, but he became a man of the times in the sense that he allowed the speculations of the times to mold his thought. In early life Mr. Beecher believed that the Bible should mold the age. In later years he tried to adapt the Bible to the spirit of opposition about him."

And yet Mr. Dixon has only partially seen the truth. The real explanation is that Mr. Beecher was a Freethinker, but also a coward. He loved popularity, wealth, and applause. But he did not believe evangelical Christianity to be true. He said so in confidence to Stephen Pearl Andrews, and when asked by the latter, after a long conversation on the subject, why he did not leave the pulpit as he did not believe the religion he was teaching, he said he could not giv up his place of honor and wealth, as life in the limited field of an ex-clergyman would be burdensome. Besides, he added, "I can now do more good work leading my congregation into Rationalism than by forsaking the church and talking to fewer people." It was this strong desire to rationalize religion, to get superstition out of the people, and the equally strong fear that some time he might say too much and be obliged to quit the Christian ministry, that produced the contrasting sermons—one of Infidelity, the other of conservativ Christianity. He startled the people by his boldness and then lulled them with a regular orthodox discourse. But no man knew better than he that his heretical sermons were the ones which left the permanent influence, and that was precisely the effect he desired. He did not preach heresies because of the influence of the speculations of the times upon his mind, but because they were the doctrins which he himself believed and wanted others to believe. But he did not want to lose his pulpit and position.

The Beauty of a Good Sunday Law.

Monday, June 29th, there was painted in a police court in this city a picture of the possibilities of the Sunday law which we hope will never fade. It ought to be kept before the people continuously, and if some artist could transfer it to canvas and get it hung in the Museum of Art, its study might help to educate the people of this city. It would be peculiarly appropriate for Sunday exhibition. Future generations, however, would undoubtedly maintain that it was a fancy sketch.

The picture was this: A policeman arraigned a man before a police justice. "I drank a glass of milk in this man's store on Sunday," said the officer. "Did you arrest him for giving you the milk?" asked the justice in astonishment. "Certainly," coolly replied the policeman. "I took him into custody for violation of the Sabbath law."

The officer was in citizen's clothes, and did not pay for the milk until the storekeeper reminded him of his remissness. The criminal was locked up several hours before bail was accepted. The justice rendered his decision, speaking to the policeman in these words: "I think you could hav employed yourself much better yesterday. This arrest should never hav been made. I do not see any harm in selling milk. The prisoner is discharged."

If the justice had added, But I see a great deal of harm in Sunday laws, he would hav sounded the keynote of the situation. Laws which allow such invasion of human rights as this are simply infamous. Locked in a dirty cell for several hours for selling a glass of milk! And yet there are thousands of good Christians in this town who will say the officer did right. And there are hundreds of thousands more in the country trying to make such procedure the rule of the land!

Mr. Wanamaker Helping the Brethren.

At its last session Congress appropriated twelve hundred and fifty thousand dollars to purchase a site for a new post-office in San Francisco, with the proviso that any remainder should be applied to erecting the building. The main thoroughfare of San Francisco, as everyone knows, is Market street, and upon that road it is the unanimous opinion of the business men of that city that the office should be placed. This was also the opinion of Mr. Wanamaker until his recent visit to the West, and before he had taken counsel of the pious ones of that golden burg. While under their influence he appointed a select committee to choose the site, with strict instructions to keep quiet for the love of God and his church. This committee was appointed immediately after consulting the members of the Calvary Presbyterian church, who desire to dispose of their property.

From statements printed in the ungodly newspapers the matter stands about thus: Calvary church site is worth some $200,000. But Mr. Wanamaker's committee will giv $400,000 for it. Adjoining land is also to be sold the government for the balance of the appropriation. The site is for the purpose practically worthless, being too far from the business center of the town. But one of 'Frisco's business men explains the deal: "Postmaster-general Wanamaker," he said, "is allowing his zeal in religious matters to overbalance his business sense. He has been impressed with the fact that nearly all of San Francisco's Protestant churches are in need of money. He has probably considered this a good opportunity to make at least one church rich. No one will question the statement that the Calvary church property is worth less than $200,000, a gilt-edged price for it. Now if it is to be put in at $400,000, double the highest possible real value, as I understand it will be, Mr. Wanamaker has some powerful motiv."

Undoubtedly Mr. Wanamaker has a powerful motiv. Of course he will not pecuniarily profit by the transaction, but he will help the Lord, or the Lord's anointed—which is the same thing—and thereby increase the brightness of his own halo and the weight of his crown when he gets to heaven. "Inasmuch as ye hav done it unto the least of one of these ye hav done it unto me," and aren't the deacons of 'Frisco some of the least of these? To be sure. So they get the people's cash, Mr. Wanamaker obtains the heavenly reward, and the glory of God thereby more abounds.

Perhaps Mr. Wanamaker will, when he has satisfactorily explained his connection with the Keystone bank of Philadelphia and his various statements relating thereto, explain why he changed his mind about this post-office site after being visited by the members of the church.

Comstock and McAfee Lose a Victim.

Mr. J. B. Caldwell, editor of Christian Life, a plain-spoken journal preaching sexual purity, has been acquitted of the charge of disseminating obscenity, and Comstock will not hav the satisfaction of seeing him in prison.

The case was called in the Chicago district of the United States court on June 9th, before Judge Blodgett. Ex-Judge Hand argued for the prosecution, and Captain Black, who defended the Anarchists, was retained for Mr. Caldwell. The defendant waived his right to a jury, and the case was decided by the judge, who reserved his decision for several days and then declared the prisoner not guilty.

In his address the defendant's counsel is reported as making an "eloquent plea for the rights of the unborn and the homes of our land. Said he hoped the day was not far distant when the subject of generation would be reverently discussed at the fireside, between mothers and sons, fathers and daughters, that they might intelligently understand the sacredness and responsibilities of these most important powers." We do not see quite clearly why the discussion on this subject should not be between mothers and daughters and fathers and sons instead of as Captain Black stated his hopes, but perhaps in that case conventionalities would not be sufficiently violated to suit the purists, though probably as intelligent an understanding of the matter would be arrived at.

But we are unfeignedly glad to know that Inquisitor Comstock and his henchman McAfee are deprived of one victim. From the few numbers of the Christian Life that we hav seen we judge Mr. Caldwell to be a man of good intentions and a respectable linguist. His piety is of the "pale phantom" order which some people of kind hearts affect when they cannot accept evangelical Christianity. His teachings will probably tend toward good, if he can reach the ones that need them. As for his prosecutors, everyone knows what they are.

Editorial Notes.

THE Christian Statesman givs its grounds for asking for Sunday laws as follows: "The only ultimate foundation for the law of Sabbath rest is found in the law of God, which has reserved one-seventh of man's time from secular uses, has made the right to rest during that portion of time one of the chiefest human rights, and made the obligation of rest as binding on states and nations as on individuals." But supposing there is no God—and who can prove there is?—or that he never made any laws, what then? Jesus Christ never established any Sabbath, and the Sabbath of the Old Testament is Saturday, so why is the Statesman arguing for Sunday?

IF we may credit the Christian Statesman, the churches are reforming, growing in humanity and decency if not in grace. It says: "Not very long since to hav mentioned the word slavery in some of our pulpits or church courts would hav called forth derision if not hisses. Where is it now? Who would stand as its godfather in any religious assembly in the land? It is within the recollection of some living when court-houses, public buildings and even churches were erected with proceeds of gambling and especially lottery schemes. Where are they now? Who would be willing to stand as their sponsor in any decent community?" We congratulate the churches on their great improvement.

THE San Francisco Wasp thus comments upon a recent incident: "At the Presbyterian General Assembly in Detroit, Dr. Breckinridge had just finished a solemn defense of the orthodox faith, menaced by modern heresy, when he swayed and fell dead. 'He walked with God, and was not, for the Lord took him.' Dr. Breckinridge's holy end will be the theme of a library of edifying sermons on the noble example of the Christian hero, dying with his armor on. But if some Atheistic crank in Ohio had raised his hand and dared the almighty to kill him, and had thereupon fallen dead as the good Presbyterian orator did, how the hinges of Talmage's mouth would hav creaked as this signal example of divine vengeance upon blasphemers was hurled in the faces of an awe-stricken congregation."

A SECULAR paper alludes to the Museum of Art, now open Sundays, as "the church in the Park." The Christian Intelligencer asks "to be informed of the success of this religious enterprise as soon as sufficient time shall hav elapsed to furnish a test. Will they tell a waiting world how many souls hav been converted, how many drunkards and gamblers reformed, how many idlers made industrious, how many saloons closed, by the Sunday exhibition of pictures and statuary? Surely if the Museum is now a church, we shall see fruits of its influences. If folks go there to worship or to receive spiritual influence, some result of this new method of seeking God's favor should be seen in their lives." We feel willing to guarantee that the Museum will hav a more beneficial influence than any church in its neighborhood and do more to keep drunkards sober, gamblers idle, idlers industrious, and saloons empty. As for "conversion," "spiritual influences," and "God's favor," they are of no particular account.

THE following well-deserved notice of a good book is from the American Sentinel: "Parker Pillsbury, of Concord, N. H., well known as one of the original anti-slavery agitators, has rendered the country another valuable service in writing 'Acts of the Anti-Slavery Apostles.' Mr. Pillsbury's book is interesting and valuable now; it will be more so in years to come. Time ever adds to the value of accurate history. The author has not only grouped together in this book an imposing array of most interesting facts concerning the anti-slavery agitation, but he has thrown into his narrativ the energy of the deep convictions which nerved him for the important part which he himself took in the struggle for the freedom of an enslaved race, and which he now modestly but faithfully relates. Those especially who hav grown up since the war which struck the shackles from four millions of their fellow-beings, should read this book, as it will enable them to estimate more nearly the value of human freedom and the degrading influence of serfdom."

TIMES are changing. The Christian Register, the chief organ of the Unitarian church in the United States, declares that Thomas Paine, "though stigmatized and set aside as an Infidel, finds reincarnation in the modern scientific biblical critic." The Register thinks that Mr. Paine was only a little in advance of his generation, and that scholarly biblical students are now beginning to look on the Bible as he did. And the Christian Advocate, chief organ of the Methodist church, adds: "There are different ways of attacking the Bible. The open, frank denunciation of the book in which Thomas Paine indulged, although vituperativ and blasphemous, is far less harmful and more manly than the thrusts of those who, while pretending to respect it as in a certain sense divine, yet really attempt to strip from it every vestige of divine authority and character." This latter thrust is directed at Dr. Briggs and the "higher critics." But it is something to find two religious organs recognizing Paine's merits.

PERHAPS few of the Liberals of this city know of the cosy place the Radical Club has provided for their social enjoyment, but they really ought to look it up, for they might find much pleasure therein. The club is neither Anarchist nor Socialist, but Liberal. Dr. Foote, Jr., and T. B. Wakeman are the leading spirits, the first looking after the business part of the enterprise (at no inconsiderable expense to himself, we imagin), and the second being the club's guide, philosopher, and friend. There is little discussion at the meetings, and its heavier work is usually followed by light diversion. The plan is not the same as the Liberal Club, the intention being to draw out the social side of the people. The club leases the entire ground floor of 37 Clinton place. The first room, as Mr. Wakeman explained, is where they talk to the members; the second is where they dance 'em; the glass-inclosed piazza is where they smoke 'em, and the fourth division is where they read 'em, being an exceedingly good library. If the members smoke too much, the explainer added, they are put out in the yard. Chess tables are provided, a piano for the musically inclined, and probably young ladies who wanted to could play progressiv eucher if they kept the prizes out of sight. The rooms are open every day and evening, and at short intervals the club has entertainments. The last was on Wednesday evening, when Mr. Wakeman wedded art and science in a nice way, and other members sang and recited and danced. Young ladies were numerous and pretty, and the children seemed to be having a good time. It is rumored that the club's terpsichorean instructor is soon to take the club's guide, philosopher, and friend in hand for a course of lessons, and the foundations of the house are being strengthened for his first appearance. The dues of the club are only fifty cents a month. Visitors are made to feel at home. There is lots of jollity for the frivolous-minded and plenty of serious talk and books for the scholarly inclined. If the club maintains its existence until next winter it will be a popular gathering-place.

Letters from Friends.

With Their Lever They Moved the World.

NEW YORK, June 25, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: The other day, while I was discussing with a procurator of the Jesuits, he said: "Yes, many years ago a noted scientist said that if he could but get a fulcrum by the side of the world, and could fix a lever between that fulcrum and the world, he could move the world from its present position. But he couldn't get the fulcrum!"

"What," said I, "do you pretend to be endowed with even a New York parochial school education, and don't know that he did get the fulcrum, and fixed a lever between it and the earth, and that he did not dare to pull upon that lever and move the earth, because the Holy Inquisition of the mother, and consequently the only genuin, Christian church was staring him in the face, with the rack, the thumb-screw, and the fagot with which to torture him? Are you not aware that when Copernicus found that fulcrum, and, for the above-named reason, did not dare to pull the lever he had fixed between it and the earth, the noble Galileo came along a hundred years thereafter, and, boldly and heroically taking hold of that lever, gave it a jerk which sent the earth spinning around the sun once a year, and revolving upon its own axis once every day; while theretofore, and because the Bible said so, the earth was flat, rested on a foundation, and had four corners? Well, well, what a holy lot of benighted dupes must be the poor, unfortunate slaves who hav no hope of any more education than that which may be acquired in a New York parochial school!" Our hearers laughed, while the Jesuit squirmed and wilted.

Yours truly, GEORGE NEWTON.

Why Not in Every City?

MILWAUKEE, WIS., June 23, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I wish to report from our city the work which has been done in the Freethought movement during the last year.

The Liberal Club commenced to hold meetings the 1st of October last fall, after a vacation of three months. Our meetings were not held in the interest of any particular "ist" or "ism," but for the whole people, and for the purpose of a higher education, seeking for truth wherever we could find it. And believing the only true way to do it is to investigate all subjects and hear all sides of every question, we hav tried to get the most able speakers we could, allowing them to choose their own subject, no matter how they treated it, whether conservativ or radical, for in the discussion which always followed every speaker it was sure to be fully discussed both from a radical and conservativ standpoint. And I want to say right here that while in the discussion there was sharp criticism, and they pitched into each other unmercifully, yet it was all done in good humor and according to parliamentary law. No personalities were indulged in. All agreed to disagree on the most friendly terms. Many think you cannot hav free discussion on all subjects with any degree of harmony. But I find that the only way to hav harmony in all meetings is to hav free speech, subject to parliamentary usages. The Spiritualists were about the first to advocate a free platform, and among the first to repudiate it afterward, so at this time some subjects are ignored from their platforms.

The meetings I hav spoken of by the Liberal Club hav been running for three or four years with increasing popularity and success. Dr. Juliet H. Severance has been the president from first until last fall, when she went South to spend the winter, and I was elected in her stead.

Our meetings will close for the season next Sunday, June the 28th. Dr. Severance will be our speaker, and her subject "Medical Mistakes," and I hope some of the doctors will be there to criticise her.

I had forgotten to mention that the speaker of the evening has a closing speech in reply to his or her critics. This givs the speaker an equal chance with the rest. Everyone is free to admit that attends our meetings that they learn a great deal more there than anywhere they go, and we think it has helped to advance Freethought to a wonderful extent.

Now, I would ask, why cannot such meetings be started in every city? Of course, the work comes upon a few. But get volunteer speakers, and then your expense for a hall is about all you hav, and the collections will about cover all expenses.

All that is required is for some two or three to start and make a move, and you will find that it can be done.

PROF. A. B. SEVERANCE.

The Sunday Fight, and a Just Illustration.

ST. JOSEPH, MO., June 21, E.M. 291.

MR. EDITOR: The forcing open of the doors of the great museum in New York is a score for the people against puritanical orthodoxy. This proves that though justice is slow to get around, yet courage and determination will win against man-made gods, and cruel, corrupt, and despotic religion—a religion for the rich, to make the rich richer and the poor poorer.

We hav been having a fight over the Sunday Rest law here in St. Joseph for several months. It was introduced by a fraud named Crafts—a name suitable to the subject. Like Paul, who declared, "Being crafty I caught you with guile," this fraud Crafts and his aiders did more work on Sunday than any other day of the week. Yet the buildings in which he labored are not taxed, though honest men and women hav to pay taxes on their property, and licenses for permission to conduct their business, trades, or occupations. These beggars, these grasshoppers, eat up the people's substance and giv them nothing in return for it but wind and a very poor article at that, and the attempt to enslave them by most unjust, senseless, and tyrannical laws and by depriving them of the exercise of their natural and just rights.

How long will intelligent people submit to the arrogance and dictation of these beggars, these more than useless fungi?

The best point made on the uselessness of religion and man-made gods was by Dr. Fisk, an eminent physician of this city, in answer to an orthodox lady a few days ago. She was speaking of the power of God and the love of Jesus, when he stated the case of the young lady who was traveling on horseback in this "Christian land," "when she was seized by two young men and forcibly dragged from the horse. In her struggle with them both of her legs were broken, and she was then taken to an old, small building and outraged in a most saintly manner, and then chained with an iron chain to the wall and abandoned. During all this time there was a man sitting quietly by on the fence who knew beforehand what these young men would do; saw every movement made by them; saw the brave defense the young woman made to protect her honor and her life; heard her calls, her screams for aid, her prayers to an unfeeling God who did not answer nor help her—this man who had power by the mere exercise of his will or the turning of his hand, to save her and overwhelm them, did nothing." After pausing, he then asked the orthodox, believing woman, "What do you think of such a man as that?" The lady seemed horrified and impetuously declared that this looker-on who made no attempt to help and save the young woman was worse than the men who perpetrated this saintly outrage. "Who was that man? The cowardly wretch! Do you know him?" she demanded. The doctor calmly answered, "That man was Mr. Jesus Christ." The lady fainted. Did you ever look at it in this light? Think of this!

ELBA, O., June 24, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: In many places religious revivals seem to hav been very successful last winter, but our community was fortunate enough to escape such an affliction. Prodigious effort and imported talent were unavailing. Their "believe or be damned" doctrin set before us, and expounded with such force (judging by the noise) by our self-constituted saints, did not hav much effect on us poor, miserable sinners, and we are still on the straight road to hell. Our saintly Christians would hav no enjoyment in heaven if they could not take a peep over the edge once in a while and see us roasting and burning in the red and lurid flames of the bottomless pit.

Some one has said that happiness consists in making others happy, so we are happy in the thought that we will be the instruments of their pleasure. There's no selfishness about us.

At our revivals we are told how mean, low, and despicable we are, and how vile a moral man is in the sight of Jehovah, unless he is a Christian of the Methodist variety. They ought to feel grateful for our voluntary sacrifice to insure their future bliss, but they seem to hav no appreciativ faculties.

A young man who lived here, W. H. Seidler, a special friend of mine, was afflicted with consumption. He was reared in strict orthodoxy, but when he grew to manhood he did not accept their doctrins as the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. He knew very little of Secular philosophy, but he had exceptional facilities for learning the hollowness and insincerity of the class of people that make the most noise at a religious revival, and he judged the doctrins by their fruits. When it became evident that he could not liv, desperate efforts were made to convert him, as it would not do to allow him to pass away in peace without professing Christianity. The stories about Old Split-foot hovering around the death-chamber of godless people were liable to be exploded and half the pleasure of the dear Sunday-school children would be forever gone. A Mr. Gant, an egoistical bombast who electrifies, as he thinks, a religious class-meeting with theological rot, visited my friend one afternoon, began lecturing him, and soon had him crying. The poor boy was passiv for a time, hoping that he would soon stop and leave, but he finally found it was necessary to defend himself, and, as he related it to me and others, talked about this way: "I think if anyone should be religious I should be, for I never knew anything else, and am a little inclined that way, but am not afraid to die as I am. I am not a criminal and am just as good as you are. You ought to be ashamed of yourself to talk to me and lecture me in that style, and if you cannot do better than that just stay away, for I don't want you around. You need not come back again." Yet this man of monumental "cheek" talked right on as if he had a right to torture the helpless. As the boy got weaker he naturally became more passiv, and shortly before he died, when he became so weak that his mind sometimes wandered, he "expressed his faith in God and said he was going to sleep with Jesus." My purpose while attending him was to secure him as much peace, comfort, and enjoyment as possible while he lived. I am censured by some for mentioning these things now. "Don't hurt anyone's feelings," they say. These people did not hesitate to torture the boy or to flaunt their alleged victory in our faces. They forget that some of his real friends may hav some feeling too. Oh, no, we are not to be considered. I shall not soon forget my promis to the deceased to avenge his wrongs. Some of these people are very noisy in telling my friends how they are going to annihilate me, but they hav not yet accepted any of their many opportunities.

We hav a class of religious people here, as you will find in most communities, who think they are the moral, spiritual, and intellectual center around which the universe revolves. We must sit in silence and listen to their tirades of abuse, but when we criticise some of their opinions or actions it makes quite a difference. It is always well to hear both sides of a case before giving judgment.

Why Parsons Want the Fair Closed.

GRANGER, WYO., June 13, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: For some time I hav been watching the effort of the holy people of our country to close the Columbian Exposition on the Lord's day, and in consequence am forced to the opinion that it is their holy job and not the welfare of the dear people which is at stake, for we well know that the clergy and the church would trample upon the rights and liberty of all nations to further their own narrow and selfish interests.

Let us figure it up in this light. If the Exposition is kept open on Sunday fully ninety per cent of the church-going people will avail themselvs of the opportunity of attending the Exposition on that day, and especially those who are obliged to attend to business during the week. Now, the preachers know this, and are shrewd enough to know their congregations will be so diminished on Sunday that they will be obliged to preach to empty benches and a few old croakers who are not able to attend the Exposition, and in consequence of this their collections of "God's money" will be very light, and our dear parsons will be very short, if not entirely out, of pocket-money during the summer of 1893. Possibly some of them are shocked at the bare idea that they may hav to go to work to keep the wolf from their door if the dear people should lose sight of their duty to God for a few Sundays. Now, it's my opinion that right here is where the shoe pinches, and if the people would agree to pay them their salaries in advance, church or no church, there would be nothing said in opposition to the opening of the World's Fair on Sunday. They would simply relapse into joyful silence and groan, "The Lord's will be done. Ohhh!!!"

You see, the preachers can attend the Exposition during the week and still rake in their own week's wages on Sunday, while the honest laboring man will be obliged to work every day in the week to keep his family and be able to attend the Exposition one day out of seven. It is my opinion that these holy chicken-eaters are the biggest drones and deadbeats the world ever produced, forever prating about the love and mercies of God, while the deeds committed in the name of God on record in the "holy Bible" (holy Kibarsh) are enough to make one's hair stand straight up to think about it.

For my part, I am obliged to work every Sunday in the year to hold my job. So are the preachers; they must hav Sunday set aside to stuff their crazy slush down the dear people's necks, or they cannot hold their job and make a living. Poor preachers, it would be too bad to see them hungry! A preacher in Houston, Tex., not long ago denounced the class of people to which I belong as "a set of night prowlers and drunkards." Better that than a set of chicken-eaters, holy loafers, and deadbeats.

God rested on Sunday. So they claim he did not call the fishes, etc., around him and preach to them to make them grateful for creation. He must hav been very weary indeed, and needed much rest from the immense week's work that he had done, as we don't know of his ever doing anything since.

Now, should our holy law-makers decide to close the Exposition on Sunday, which day would that be?—the day that God was supposed to hav finished his work and rested therefrom, or the day set aside for holy pow-wow by the church? Which would they obey—the Bible or the church? Now, I should like to see the day that these croaking asses should be obliged to go to work for a living! And such would be the case if the people could only be taught that the devil was not going to get them when they died. If they could only be taught the truth the church would die as dead as a cloven oyster in less than two years. It is the fear of hell, not the love of heaven, that keeps up the church to-day.

Again I say, it is the personal welfare of the clergy, not the welfare of the people, that urges them to fight for the closing of the Exposition on Sunday.

What are the principles of the church built on anyway? The question answers itself—the rock of ignorance and superstition. Granting that the Bible is what the clergy claims it to be, Christ never taught any creed or dogmas. He forbid his gospel-slingers taking money for their labor. And his own disciples doubted his authority and identity. And he lost faith in the power of his supposed father to save him on the cross before death; and yet in the face of all conflicting stories the church exists and flourishes in the name of the "Father, Son, and Holy Ghost." How in the name of common sense can intelligent people swallow such stuff? Will some good God-fearing preacher or priest tell me? I am,

Yours, willing to be enlightened, F. R. DRESBACK,
Telegraph Operator and Infidel.

More Moralists than Christians.

BREATHEDSVILLE, MD., June 20, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: The German Baptists had their annual meeting at Hagerstown, which commenced on May 28th and lasted a week, and as I thought it might interest some of your readers, I will giv a short description of it as I saw it during my four days' attendance.

The annual meeting is their final court of resort in Bible explanation and church government, from all over the United States, and here they arrange all matters, even to the style of their clothes for male or female members. They aim at plainness of dress and are opposed to the wearing of jewelry of any kind, or any display of high-mindedness, treating everyone as a friend wherever they meet them, never standing on any ceremonies or waiting for an introduction before they can speak to others.

Having established a set of rules or laws that lead to thrift, many of their members are well-to-do people, and all preachers, who can, as well as many laymen, visit these annual meetings, producing large crowds. I should judge there was a daily average attendance of ten thousand while the meeting lasted. On Sunday there may hav been fifteen thousand. To board and lodge all these ample arrangements had been made at twenty-five cents per meal and twenty-five cents for a night's lodging; and everything in the eating line, with lemonade, could be had on the grounds even on Sunday. And although the weather was warm and there were several rain showers during the meeting, all was harmonious like a well-raised family, which all lovers of humanity must admire. It is true that in the exuberance of joy at seeing old friends some were a little too loud under the tabernacle to permit others hearing the exercises then going on, but as a rule the behavior was most excellent even in this respect. While sitting listening and observing I felt that I was among a set of people with the best intentions, and my heart went spontaneously out to them with a wish that they could still see a little further in reason and come to the foundation-rock of demonstrated truth. As a people they are more liberal and more guided by common sense than most religious sects. They hav no infant or heathen damnation in their creed now, because their creed is the Bible as explained by these annual meetings. Their explanations of the Bible so far hav been to make the church no matter of speculation or merchandise, but they still call it the inspired word of God, which made me feel very sorry indeed. But as many of them lack education, and hav, no doubt, never examined critically into this matter, they may learn after a while that the Bible was made by voting, the same as their church rules are made at these annual meetings.

One of their preachers or elders, a believer in miracles, tackled the miracle of wine-making, and showed, in his own mind perhaps, that all things are possible with God. That it is possible with God for you to be your own great-grandmother and great-grandson at the same time. But it would hav done your heart good to hav seen him sweat, even with his coat off. He realized that he had tackled a whopper, as well as those who heard him, and I suppose he will steer clear of miracles in the future, as lying for God's sake is no better than other lying, even by a man with the best intentions. You cannot realize how much I wished that the only creed and belief in this world would be, Do right at all times, and that all those who practiced this could meet in brotherly and sisterly fellowship, as did these people, where each tried to protect the other from extortion, and helped to make others happy and comfortable, even though they did not belong to them as members of their church. Now let me say to one and all of the German Baptist Brotherhood who may see this notice, you hav shown the right spirit to one another and to outsiders, as I hav never seen done by any other church to my recollection. And in that spirit we outsiders, good and law-abiding citizens, are with you heart and hand, but we cannot say we believe to be true what nature, common sense, and science tell us is untrue. And as each believes what he must believe from the evidence he has on the subject, if he is honest with himself there is after all no real difference that either party can be responsible for. But the entire matter of difference between all honest, well-behaved citizens is simply a matter of education and surrounding influences as to what they say they believe. For instance, where the father and mother say they believe the Christian Bible to be the word of God, the children are apt to say the same thing from young up without spending a thought about it. And so the same with the Mohammedans and every other religion; it is unconsciously, as it were, transmitted from one generation to another, in many instances even without a thought of its probable truth.

This is all wrong. No one ought to say he believes without examining the evidence in the matter, and the evidence alone should determin his belief. How many followers of the different religions in the world are such by evidence? Not one in ten thousand, but perhaps one in one hundred thousand. Yours respectfully, JOHN M. GROH.

A Rationalized Catholic to the Pope.

RICEVILLE, IA., June 15, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find an Open Letter to the Pope. If you will allow it space in THE TRUTH SEEKER I will send a marked copy of the same to his humbugness. The letter is also dedicated to my Catholic friends.

Yours antipapally, HENRY BISSON.

AN OPEN LETTER TO THE POPE.

RICEVILLE, IA., June 15, R.M. 291.

MR. PECCI, alias YOUR HOLI(HUMBUG)NESS POPE LEO XIII., Rome, Italy, Reverend Sir: I was raised a Roman Catholic, and I lived up to that religion until I was about twenty-two years old, when I began to think and read and investigate for myself. The result was that I soon found the truth and was convinced that Christianity is a delusion and a farce and cannot stand the test of criticism. Your holiness of course knows how Catholics are made. In the years of infancy and childhood, when the mind of the child is not yet capable of reasoning and judging between facts and imagination, between reality and delusion, between truth and falsehood, and when the mind is capable of being molded like a brick, then is the time when priestcraft takes advantage of the poor dupes. I compare Catholics with dumb brutes, which are compelled to carry their burdens and pull their loads. The latter are threatened with the whip, the Catholics are threatened with purgatory and hell.

When I was about six years old I was sent to a Catholic school, where I did not learn much of anything but the catechism and the Catholic religion. One of your fanatical priests would visit the school twice a week, when he would teach us all about a kind and merciful God and about the tidings of great joy—namely, an everlasting hell, where all heretics and Infidels and all non-Catholics would be tormented forever and ever, while the popes, priests, nuns, monks, and a few idiots would play on their harps in heaven. So I let the priest do the thinking for me (on religious matters) for a few years, but after a while I began to think that I had a right to think for myself, and the result is that I am now emancipated from all mental slavery and free from all priestly bigotry and superstition.

Now, Mr. Pecci, please allow me to tell you what I do believe and what I do not believe. I do not believe there is a personal God or a devil, a heaven or a hell, or purgatory; neither do I believe that human beings hav immortal souls. These things exist only in the minds of credulous and superstitious people. I also do not believe that you or your priests can make Gods out of dough or wafers, or that you or the priests hav the power to forgiv sins. Neither do I believe that you or the priests believe those things yourselvs, but you are only upholding the old fraud for the money and fat lazy living there is in your false doctrin. But I believe that the confessional is often used as a trap by the priests to seduce innocent young girls. I also believe that you (the pope) and popery, with your infallibility, are the greatest humbug on earth. I believe that Catholicism and Christianity is the greatest humbug, fraud, superstition, and curse that has ever cursed humanity, and I think that this curse should be wiped from the face of this earth, and that liberty, humanity, and Freethought should take the place of religion. I hope that you will be the last pope and that popery will go to (hell) the grave with you and never disgrace this world any more. I believe in justice and I am not in favor of crime, but if you or one of your successors should ever be inclined to locate in the United States, then I hope that there will be loyal citizens enough in this country to treat you (or him) to a hemp collar, and hang you up on the mast of the ship on which you may arrive, so as not to allow you to disgrace this glorious free country by setting your foot on it. These are my compliments to you; take that for a warning, old fellow.

I will refer you to a few of the popes who hav occupied the chair of St. Peter who will be a fair sample of papal infallibility and as followers of the meek and lowly Jesus: Paschal I., Popess Joan, Nicholas I., Sergius, John XI., Boniface VII., Benedict IX., Gregory VII., Adrian IV., Innocent III., Innocent IV., Boniface VIII., John XXII., Urban VI., John XXIII., Martin V., Paul II., and Alexander VI.; and many more could be mentioned. (If you or any of your good Catholics want more information about the popes, then I advise you to read D. M. Bennett's "Champions of the Church.") These monsters the popes in disguise of infallibility hav committed all kinds of crime, such as assassination, incest, adultery, rape, and all kinds of vileness and most shameful debaucheries.

There was a time once when kings and emperors trembled before the pope's excommunication, but I as a Freethinker hav no fear of you whatever. You may sling your anathema maranathas and maledictions and curses at me across the Atlantic ocean until your supply is exhausted and still I do not fear your holyhumbugness.

Such men as Voltaire, Thomas Paine, D. M. Bennett, Horace Seaver, and Col. R. G. Ingersoll hav done more good for this world than all the popes and priests which ever lived on the face on this earth.

I will withdraw the curtain for a moment and take a view of the drama of popery and Catholicism. The past rises before me, as it were, like a dream. I see the Crusades, which cost millions of human lives. I see millions of Catholics, at the instigation of the popes, undertake expeditions to Asia to take the Holy Land from the Infidels. The pious Catholics assassinate seventy thousand human beings in Jerusalem all for the glory of God. I see the wars of extermination against the Albigenses. At Bezuers I see sixty thousand men, women, and children murdered by the pope's army. I see the massacre of St. Bartholomew in France, where the Catholics killed over forty thousand Huguenots, and I see that terrible event celebrated by Pope Gregory XIII. by a solemn procession to San Luiga. I see the Inquisition, with all the instruments of torture which priestcraft and popery could invent, with all its horrors and dungeons, which caused the torturing and burning at the stake of nine million of innocent human beings for the imaginary crimes of witchcraft and heresy. I see the killing of Hypatia by St. Cyril's mob of merciless monks in Alexandria. I see the burning of Bruno, the great martyr of science, at the stake in Rome. I see thousands of sweet, lovely young maidens induced by hypocritical priests to go to the hells on earth called nunneries there to be compelled to satisfy the brutish lusts of popes and popish monks and priests, and I see the smothering of new-born babies to be sent to heaven for the glory of Christ (see "Terrible Disclosures of Maria Monk"). I look again and I see nations against nations at wars of extermination instigated by the infallible vicars and vice-regents of Christ in the chair of St. Peter in Rome. I see human blood enough shed on account of Christianity and popery to supply a Niagara for twenty-four hours all for the glory of an imaginary God. This is a faint description of the picture I behold in reviewing Catholicism and popery. Oh, if you popes and priests only could blot out that dark page in history and hav it forgotten by the human race! But ye cannot do that. We Liberals and lovers of liberty and humanity, we shall always know it in all times to come.

Now, Mr. Pecci, I would advise you to renounce popery and Christianity and all errors and proclaim the truth.

It is to be hoped that a grand new monument will be erected in the near future on the ruins of the Vatican and the church of St. Peter in Rome, in honor of Giordano Bruno.

These are the sentiments of an ex-Catholic, but now a confirmed Infidel. HENRY BISSON.

Crushing Blows on Bible and Church.

IPAVA, ILL., June 30, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: "Blaspheming the name of the Lord and desecrating the Lord's day, and not paying the Lord as much as is due him or as he should hav," hav been the subjects much discussed by the preachers in our town for the past four or five weeks. Lurid pictures of a burning hell hav been painted for the non-contributor and the blasphemer. Perhaps the pictures are correctly painted, for I know no class that blaspheme so much and contribute so little as the priests and preachers, for the real blasphemer is he who accuses God of doing wrong because some ignorant, superstitious man or woman has done wrong.

Those same blasphemers and prevaricators built partitions through the center of what they were pleased to call the house of God to keep men and women from sitting together. But the self-appointed agents could frisk around on the right side with perfect safety.

Now, these self-appointed administrators of God's kingdom, the surveyors of the ethereal blue, commonly called sky-pilots, were all good men, as history tells us. These special agents once said it was an impious act and a criminal offense for a man to kiss his wife on Sunday. Would it be or could it be impious for a man to kiss his wife, she being willing, at any time or place? Surely, no. What possible harm could there be in a kiss? To the bad all things are bad.

If it is wrong to go out riding on Sunday, it is wrong to preach, for the book says, rest on the Sabbath day, and it is an undeniable fact that there is more rest, more comfort, riding through the country beholding the beauties of nature and the real word of God than there is in listening to a dull sermon on ancient robberies and murders by the elect.

Is it wrong for the fish to swim or the birds to sing on Sunday? No, surely it cannot be. Then how can it be wrong for men and women to go out riding or boating and enjoy the exquisit beauty in nature?

Which day is Sunday? Can some one answer so it will be satisfactory to all? Every day is a day of rest with some nation, tribe, or individual. And according to their own teaching we are living under the law of "free grace," which means liberty to enjoy the Sabbath which was made for man. Some of our laws long after "free grace" and long after secular liberty were the most damnable. For example, "No man shall be a freeman or giv a vote unless he be converted." Hardly free grace or liberty!

"No Quaker or dissenter shall be allowed to vote." This was what they called select voting, liberty to the elect only.

"If any person turns Quaker he shall be banished." Conversion to the Quaker religion did not count. And as the law specified "he," women had no voice in the matter. The men who made the law were evidently Paulites.

"No one shall run on the Sabbath day or walk in his garden." No one could run to save life, or walk in his garden feasting his eyes upon the flowers, the beautiful and the only real revelation of a creator.

"No one shall cook, travel, or make beds or sweep house on the Sabbath day." Could anything be more ridiculous? According to such laws, God or no God, it is a virtue to be dirty and a crime to be clean. By their dirt ye shall know them!

"The Sabbath shall begin at sunset Saturday." A good wife could not cook a supper for a tired husband after sunset Saturday, no matter how hungry he was.

"No woman shall kiss her baby on the Sabbath or fasting day." All the above laws were enforced in our own beautiful land of the free where Thomas Paine said: "Liberty has been hunted around the world. Let us prepare an asylum for mankind."

If it is impious to take pleasure on Sunday, it is impious to laugh or express an opinion.

Our forefathers fought that we might liv and enjoy life, and we would be unworthy the life given us if we allow Sabbath drones (I say drones because they expect the working bees to bring in the honey—money—on Sunday) to take away our liberty which was so dearly bought.

Men and women were created for each other. There is an affinity that draws them together, and God nor devil cannot keep them apart and let them liv. It is love for women that makes men manly. It is love for men that makes women pure and sweet. Good women by their influence control men and make them brave and patriotic. And in return for that influence noble men protect virtuous women.

I believe the time is not far distant when educated, moral men and women will be ashamed to teach the Bible as the word of God, the creator. The Bible is not good. It is not moral. It is not decent. It has in the hands of "vipers and hypocrits" ruined thousands of homes, and licensed rascals to "bind and unbind" to suit their individual taste. That taste, according to history, has been that of the tiger and hyena—indulgence and gratification at the expense of the poorer class and weaker sex.

The time will soon come when every moral man and virtuous woman for the sake of morality, home, and virtue will be ashamed to say Jesus Christ was the son of God. For if Christ was the son of God, then libertins are Godlike and bastards identical with Jesus Christ.

In Christ's death Paul saw his opportunity, and he made use of it for selfish motivs. Prior to Christ's death he was a persecutor of Christ.

Jesus Christ was a good man in his simple way and did much good. But the hypocrits who persecuted him in life became his sustainers after death, that they might glorify themselvs by teaching a little good for much bad already done.

To teach that a liar, a hypocrit, a robber, a seducer, a betrayer, a slanderer, by a little credulity and water poured on by a priest or preacher will make a fit subject for heaven, is a reward for crime, and a nauseating stench in the nostrils of good people who simply believe in right doing.

According to the Bible, God is the author of all things, both good and evil. As he made the devil (sin), and as the sins (the devils) of the parents are visited upon the children, so we see God's sin in the devil.

So, as I said in the beginning, the book and its supporters are the greatest blasphemers against the creator.

As it takes time for a tree to grow, so it takes time for education in evolution. Let every Liberal teach the absurdities and deceptions of the Bible to their children, and the earth will in time support a people who do not believe in the miraculous and will not support the self-styled mediators between God and man. Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fal River, Mass., to whom all Communications for his Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

The Czar and the Dead Soldier.

[There hav been said some very hard things about the "czar of all the Russias." If the poem below is not simply imagination, let us hope that we may hear shortly of some worthy deeds performed by the czar toward the living men and women in his domain.—ED. C. C.]

Unarmed and unattended walked the czar
Through Moscow's busy streets one wintry day:
The crowd uncovered as his face they saw;
"God greet the czar!" said they.

Along his path there moved a funeral,
Gray spectacle of poverty and woe;
A wretched sledge, dragged by one weary man
Slowly across the snow.

And on the sledge, blown by the wintry wind,
Lay a poor coffin, very rude and bare;
And he who drew it bent beneath his load
With dull and sullen air.

The emperor stopped and beckoned to the man:
"Who is't thou bearest to the grave?" he said.
"Only a soldier, sire," the short reply,
"Only a soldier dead."

"Only a soldier," musing, said the czar,
"Only a Russian, who was poor and brave.
Move on; I follow; such a one goes not Unhonored to the grave."

He bent his head, and reverent raised his cap,
The czar of all the Russias, pacing slow,
Following the coffin as again it went
Slowly across the snow.

The passers in the street, all wondering,
Looked on the sight; then followed silently.
Peasant and prince, and artisan, and clerk,
All in one company.

Still as they went the crowd grew evermore,
Till thousands stood around the friendless grave,
Led by that princely heart who, royal, true,
Honored the poor but brave.

"I Am Great and You Are Small"

A sparrow swinging on a branch
Once caught a passing fly.
"Oh, let me liv!" the insect prayed,
With trembling, piteous cry.
"No," said the sparrow, "you must fall,
For I am great and you are small."

The bird had scarce begun his feast
Before a hawk came by.
The game was caught. "Pray let me liv!"
Was now the sparrow's cry.
"No," said the captor, "you must fall,
For I am great and you are small."

An eagle saw the rogue, and swooped
Upon him from on high.
"Pray let me liv! Why should you kill
So small a bird as I?"
"Oh," said the eagle, "you must fall,
For I am great and you are small."

But while he ate, the hunter came;
He let his arrow fly.
"Tyrant!" the eagle shrieked, "you hav
No right to make me die!"
"Ah!" said the hunter, "you must fall,
For I am great and you are small."

Historical Puns.

The Roman bishop's famous compliment to the handsome Anglo-Saxon captivs, "Not Angles, but angels," had greater results than its actual brilliancy might seem to merit; and St. Leo doubtless had no idea when he prayed to heaven to aid Rome against the invading Huns, "and hurl back these Tartars into the fires of Tartarus," that this punning prayer was to fix upon the unlucky "Tartars" (as they were then called) a nickname that would never die.

Such puns hav more than once played a formidable part in history. France expiated by the devastation of an entire province a coarse and clumsy play upon "corpse" and "corpulence" made by the French king in derision of his terrible neighbor, William the Conqueror. Charles V.'s jesting assertion that he could put Paris in his glove (gant), though meant only to indicate the superior size of Ghent to the Paris of that day, stung Francis I. into the renewal of a languishing war. One of Louis XV.'s upstart favorits was driven from the court by the biting pun that turned his new title of Marquis de Vandiere into "Marquis d'Avant-hier" (the day before yesterday).

The epigrammatic brevity of Sir Francis Drake's celebrated but probably mythical dispatch announcing the rout of the Armada—which consisted of the single word, "Cantharides," i. e., the Spanish fly—has been twice paralleled in our own age. Sir Charles Napier and Lord Dalhousie respectivly announced the annexation of Scinde and that of Oude in one word apiece, Peccavi—I hav sinned (Scinde), and Vovi, I hav vowed (Oude). Equally historical is the bitter pun that changed the name of the sluggish Admiral Torrington to "Admiral Tarry-in-town."

Napoleon, who was no man for light jesting, is credited with only a single pun, and that a rather poor one. During his great Italian campaign of 1796-7 he replied to a lady, who wondered to find such a famous man so young, "I am young to-day, but to-morrow I shall hav Milan" (i. e., "mille ans," a thousand years). A much better was that made upon the great conqueror himself by an Italian countess, who hearing him say, "All Italians are traitors," replied, pointedly, "Not all of them, but a good part" (Buo naparte). Equally neat, and even more grimly significant, was Bismarck's answer to a person who was speculating how much the impending war of 1870 would cost France. "Not much," said the Iron Count, "only two Napoleons!"

James Keeps His Place.

There is a small boy working in a mercantil establishment in this town who is not likely to be hanged while he stays in New York state and the present laws stand as they do. More than this concerning this young man it would be rash to prophesy.

Now, the merchant who employs him to do a great many things very badly is large, red of face, pompous, and dignified. He was once in the Senate gallery at Washington when Roscoe Conkling sat down, metaphorically speaking, on a statesman from Jimtown or some other place. Since that time this merchant has been Conklingesque, particularly when rebuking an employee.

Now, the small boy, who may be called James, succeeded the other day in performing some especially villainous action that drew down upon him the wrath of his employer. So he was called into the presence. The dignified merchant expanded his chest, frowned, and proceeded to annihilate the small boy with a look. The small boy would not annihilate.

"James!" said the merchant haughtily.

"Yas, sir," said James not at all haughtily.

"I wish you to listen to me."

"Yas, sir," said James.

"This sort of thing won't do at all, sir."

"Yas, sir," said James.

"There can be no apology for such proceedings! Do you hear, sir?" said the merchant. "I will not hear of an apology, sir!"

"Yas, sir," said James, "but I havn't made none."

Then the séance closed, and James is not yet discharged. The haughty merchant is still thinking the matter over, and does not see his way clear. James does.

Five Arab Maxims.

Never tell all you know; for he who tells everything he knows often tells more than he knows.

Never attempt more than you can do; for he who attempts everything he can do often attempts more than he can do.

Never believe all you may hear; for he who believes all that he hears often believes more than he hears.

Never lay out all you can afford; for he who lays out everything he can afford often lays out more than he can afford.

Never decide upon all you may see; for he who decides upon all that he sees often decides on more than he sees.

Correspondence.

GRAND MOUND, IA., June 20, 1891.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I thought I would write to the Children's Corner for the third time. I was ten years old the 3d of June. It has been raining for two or three days.

The crops are very promising this year.

I like George Remsburg's letters; they are very interesting.

Papa has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER for a long, long time. I go to school regularly and study in the Sixth Reader, history, arithmetic, geography, physiology, grammar, spelling, writing, and singing.

Wishing you success, I remain,
Your little Infidel, GOLDIE M. DUTTON.

SAN BERNARDINE MTS., June 5, 1891.

MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Dear Friend: This is the first time I ever attempted to write to a paper. If others do not appreciate the effort more than I do, I do not think I will make another trial.

We liv in the San Bernardine mountains, six thousand feet above the sea—the ocean, San Bernardine valley with all her beautiful orange groves, in plain view. The mountain is covered with pine trees, also oak. There are five saw-mills close to us.

We hav no near neighbors except an old man by the name of Hanson. He takes THE TRUTH SEEKER; that is how I came to know about the Corner. We all think it is grand. I do hope the time is not far distant when it will cease to be a Corner and become a whole room. My father got for us two of your books, "Apples of Gold" and "Story Hour;" we are very much pleased with them. He is going to send for "All in a Lifetime" and THE TRUTH SEEKER.

We do not hav any school; mother teaches us at home. I study geography, grammar, arithmetic, reading, and spelling.

I hav four sisters, of which I am next to the oldest. I hav five brothers. We hav lots of sport in the woods. We hav a donkey, and all can ride that can hang on; we call him Balaam.

I hope this letter will not find its way to the waste-basket.

I will close, hoping to see this in print.

Yours truly, MAUD KUFFEL.

WENATCHEE, WASH., June 6, 1891.

MISS SUSAN H. WIXON: I notice there are very few letters from Washington, so I will try and add one more to the list.

I hav just been reading C. B. Reynolds's "Facts on Sunday Laws and Sabbath Observance." It is a splendid little pamphlet. Every Christian should be persuaded to read it, and they would put their "thinking-caps" on and be made to see how the Bible contradicts itself.

I would love to sit down and read it to some "good" Christian and set him to thinking.

I join in with those who want a Freethought paper for children; they would naturally take more interest in it. What a help it would be, written in a clear, simple style, and made interesting with sketches on history, nature, or something instructiv. If you will edit one, large numbers will subscribe.

C. B. Reynolds is doing good work here. It is a pity that there are not more like him.

From what I can gather, our Eastern friends hav but vague ideas of Washington as it is. It is further advanced and has more population than is thought. There are no "wild Indians" here; they are all peaceable and quiet only when they take too much "fire water"—that is, liquor.

The Liberal Temperance Club that is proposed in the Corner is a grand idea. Most Christians think that we are intemperate, believe in drinking, swearing, chewing tobacco, and other bad habits. It would be help to our cause to advocate temperance.

Let me tell you what I hav had to endure all this year at scho l.

Our teacher was a devout Christian and opened school every morning with hymn-singing and a chapter from the Bible. It would take up over a quarter of an hour of valuable time.

And I noticed that he did not scold us Infidels once during the whole for studying or anything during these exercises, but scolded the little Christian children often, even his own sisters.

I heard him say that a girl as old as I ought to be made to believe in the Bible. I would like to see him make me believe it.

I was glad to see a letter from Daisy Suter, of Turkey, again.

Hoping to be favored with a place in the Corner, I will close.

HELEN MARGARET PARRISH.

OAK MILLS, KAN., June 25, 1891.

MISS WIXON, Dear Friend and Teacher: I hav just been reading the last Corner, and I concluded to write another brief letter for its columns. The last Corner was very interesting, as was the one preceding it. In fact, they are all interesting and instructiv. Ida A. Ballou's essay on "Parental Authority" was really good. She is a good writer, and her contributions are a great help to the Corner. The poem by that sweet warbler of Nebraska, Mrs. Finch, was, as usual, well composed. I am filling a scrap-book with her beautiful poems. "Some Thoughts on Religion" by R. S. C., of Omaha, was very instructiv. Edwin W. Beecher and Mollie Walton write splendid letters. The little poem by Anna M. Mohn was short but full of sentiment.

Since the account of my collection appeared in the Corner I hav been the recipient of a number of interesting relics and curiosities. Some one, I know not who, sent me an eagle, stuffed and mounted. On the box in which it was sent is printed, "German Fruit Co., Los Angeles, Cal." I wrote to this company asking them if they sent the eagle, and they did not. I hav no idea who sent it, but I wish to thank the person who was so kind as to make such a valuable contribution to my collection, and I hope the party or parties will write to me.

Among the other things lately added to my collection are the following: A picture that hung on the wall of the house of one of the first settlers of Kentucky; wood from the battlefields of Dalton, Atlanta, and Nashville; a piece of the large sandstone on which Jeff Davis sat just before the great battle of Lookout Mountain; also a piece of the stone over which the Union troops climbed in ascending the mountain; a bayonet used in the Revolutionary war; six genuin Confederate bills, the historic set of the rebellion; a copy of the Columbian Sentinel dated Dec. 1, 1790; a piece of the rope and tree on which Bagnetto, one of the New Orleans assassins, was hanged, March 27, 1891; a piece of shell from the battlefield of Missionary Ridge; a piece of brick from the Charleston earthquake; a stone from St. Augustine; a hickory nut from the grave of Thomas Paine; clover blossoms from the tomb of Lincoln; a pocket-knife over one hundred years old, and many other interesting relics: I hav also added the following Indian relics: Three stone axes, two stone hammers, one discoidal stone, two stone bark-peelers, one stone weight, one flint drill, one flint scraper, one flint knife, several flint spear-heads, and some fine arrow-heads. Besides the above I hav just received some fragments of fossil mastodon tusks from a friend in Iowa. I also hav several hundred foreign coins.

I am making a collection of Indian arrow-points from every state in the Union, and if the readers of the Corner will send me some from their states, I will return the favor in some way.

With best wishes to all, I remain,
Your Liberal friend, GEO. J. REMSBURG.

Chats with Correspondents.

MAUD KUFFEL, San Bernardino Mts, Cal.—Such a letter as you hav written can never find its way to the waste-basket. It must be lovely where you liv. What fine times you must hav! And what delightful rides with old Balaam! It makes the Editor feel that she would like to be there to "hang on with the rest." Maud may not hav the privilege of attending school, but her penmanship and the general make-up of her letter show that she has excellent teaching. We hav some school-books, readers, and grammars which we will giv Maud for herself and the children, if they care for them enough to send postage for forwarding the same. Kind regards to the mother and father of so many dear children, and also to Mr. Hanson. Thanks for kind wishes to the Corner. Come again.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. Price 25 cents.

News of the Week.

DYNAMITE was recently exploded beneath the Capitoline monument at Rome to Victor Emmanuel, Garibaldi, Cavour, and Mazzini, the Freethinking overthrowers of papal temporal rule and founders of the Italian nation. The act is imputed to members of the Clerical party.

HANNIBAL HAMLIN died on the 4th.

PROMPT military action has disarmed the Arizona Moqui.

THE Salvation Army will be suppressed in Prussia for turbulence and immorality.

REV. WM. OGDEN was providentially stricken dead while preaching at Warrensburg, N. Y., on the 28th ult.

THE "Pro's," or Lottery opponents, of Louisiana hav warned the "Anti's" that they will resort to revolution if necessary.

COLONEL INGERSOLL has conferred with President Harrison as to laying a direct cable to Brazil, for which project he is attorney.

HALLINGER, the Jersey city negro murderer, respited from execution at the last moment, says he regrets the stay, as he is certain that he would hav gone straight from the gallows to heaven.

HERR CAHENSLY'S memorial to the pope praying that foreign languages and racial distinctions be perpetuated by immigrants here, the better to preserve their Catholicity, is meeting censure.

GEORGE WASHINGTON, a negro murderer, hanged near Atlanta on the 3d, joked about his fate for a time, but sobered and embraced religion a few days before execution. His body was exhibited in state in a negro church and given a grand funeral.

REV. FRANK STEVENS has been crazed by acquaintance with Lieutenant Totten, who predicts that the millennium will come in this decade. He believes himself the savior, who, Totten predicts, is to reappear. He has been committed to the Hartford Insane Retreat a hopeless maniac. His young wife is heart-broken.

THE Chilian war still wages ferociously. The insurgents hav most sympathy abroad. President Balmaceda, of the opposit party, is arbitrary and oppressiv in conscription, confiscation, and other acts. He denies that he has tortured prisoners. The Itata arrived at San Diego on the 5th, in charge of the Charleston, and her officers and crew will be arrested for absconding while under arrest and abducting a United States marshal.

FOUR murderers were to be electrocuted at Sing Sing, N. Y., on the 7th. Slocum, who after beating his wife for years clove her head with an ax, when seen by a reporter "was reading Thomas à Kempis's 'Imitation of Christ,' deeply absorbed. He had several other religious books. He has taken a great fancy to Father Lynch. 'That is good reading,' said Father Lynch, referring to the 'Imitation of Christ,' over which Slocum was still poring. Slocum used to read a good deal of novels, but he gave them up for religious books several weeks ago." He was confident as to the future. Smiler was once a Salvation Army captain. He had several wives at once, and killed his last one because she refused to stay in the room while he was drunk. "He has spent a great deal of his time in reading theological and religious books. The books which hav most interested him were volumes of sermons. He has devoured Spurgeon and Beecher and Talmage. Bunyan's 'Pilgrim's Progress' was a favorit with him. The Bible he has read with seeming great devotion and interest. The only change in Smiler which Mr. Edgerton has noticed as the days wore, was that he grew less interested in outside things and turned more and more to his Bible. For the last two or three days he has read nothing else. His talk with Mr. Edgerton this time has all been directly on the point of his preparation for the future. Smiler has repeatedly expressed himself as being ready and confident. His references to his crime hav been very few, and they hav not included expressions of penitence." Wood, says a reporter, "spent the morning in reading the lives of several of the saints." The fourth murderer, Jugiro, was a Japanese, and died in his own religion. Slocum, Smiler, and Jugiro were executed; Wood secured a stay.

JEHU DRIVETH.

And the watchman told, saying, He came even unto them, and cometh not again: and the driving is like the driving of Jehu the son of Nimshi; for he driveth furiously.—2 Kings ix, 20.

LET us dishonor war. No, glorious war does not exist.—Hugo.

SELFISHNESS always aims at creating around it an absolute uniformity of type.—Oscar Wilde.

PRIESTS hav everywhen and everywhere introduced fraud and falsehood.—Napoleon Bonaparte.

NOTHING originates and nothing perishes, and the secret of nature lies in an eternal self-sustained circle, wherein cause and effect are united without beginning and without end.—Buchner.

THE intellectual horizon has expanded, within this century, beyond the power of computation, and largeness is inevitably the prevailing note. We no longer grope our way with timid steps; we stride with seven-league boots to our conclusions. The toil of countless generations has put a mass of details at our disposition, and the task of this generation is to sum them up. This tendency shows itself everywhere. The closest investigator of the age, Charles Darwin, is also its boldest generalizer, and the researches of a Pasteur or a Koch rivet attention through our comprehension of the role of the infinitly little as the infinitly great. . . . We ransack the god cupboards of every age and race, seeking materials for the construction of a religion of—Humanity, which, in the face of Philistine sneers, we practically, in our hearts, all spell with capitals.—W. Owen.

NEED we wonder that the converts of that creed believed in the merit of passiv submission to the caprices of earthly despots, and scorned the appeals of justice in their dealings with pagans and Freethinkers? Why should men try to be better than their God? The worshipers of a God who doomed the souls of unbaptized children and honest dissenters, naturally had no hesitation in assailing the bodies of their unbelieving fellow-men, and princes who loaded fawning sycophants with favors which they denied to honest patriots could appeal to the sanction of a divine precedent. Every petty "sovereign of six faithful square miles" accordingly became a law to himself. A man's might was the only measure of his right.—Professor Oswald.

I BELIEVE that to read and believe the Old Testament naturally makes a man careless of human life.—Ingersoll.

IF men were only ignorant and knew that they were so; only void of belief and sorry for it, instead of filled with sham beliefs and proud of it!—Carlyle.

To me every hour of the light and dark is a miracle,
Every cubic inch of space is a miracle,
Every square yard of the surface of the earth is spread with the same,
Every foot of the interior swarms with the same.

To me the sea is a continual miracle,
The fishes that swim—the rocks—the motion of the waves—the ships with men in them,
What stranger miracles are there?—Walt Whitman.

EVOLUTION is not at variance with religion; in its highest sense it is a religion in itself. The Evolutionist is humble in the presence of Nature; she represents the last phase of the great First Cause. Others may scoff at her, the child of their God; he loves her, for she is his companion, his mother, and his nurse; she ministers to his pleasures, yet she works for his advancement; awake, he studies her, for she is the mine of his learning; asleep, he dreams on the unseen working of her wondrous laws; he listens, he sees, and ever wonders; but he worships not for he has no fear. . . . He cares but as an antiquarian for the book of the Jews. Nobler inducements has he to act righteously than the most learned and pious divine. If he sins, he knows well that the future will be tainted by the deeds he has done. He it is not that does right lest his soul should forever be lapt in noisome sulphurous flames; he shuns evil that he may leave behind him a purer and nobler form, that he may hand down to posterity habits that advantage the race as a whole, that he may, however humble his sphere, contribute in some way to the happiness of the future race, and mitigate its inheritance of pain.—Ridsdale.

"A hideous, sordid, and emaciated maniac, without knowledge, without patriotism, without natural affection, passing his life in a long routine of useless and atrocious self-torture, and quailing before the ghastly phantoms of his delirious brain had become the ideal of the nations which had known the writings of Plato and Cicero and the lives of Socrates and Cato!"

(See Lecky's Hist. Eu. Morals, Vol. II, pp. 107 to 127.)

St. Macarius, who slept in a marsh, and exposed his body to the stings of venomous insects

St. Eusebius, who lived in a dried-up well for three years.

St. Besarion, who lived among thorns, and for 40 years did not lie down to sleep.

St. Simeon Stylites, whose personal uncleanness was too horrible to describe.

Hermits, who lived in dens of wild beasts and among the tombs.

Grazers, who ate grass like cattle and never lived under a roof.

PIOUS WORTHLESSNESS AND FANATICISM—HOW SOME OF THE SAINTS LIVED.

Notes and Clippings.

"THERE is only one prophet," writes Walter Besant, "and Edison is his name." A new creed truly.

IN no place in all this world to-day, the Roman Catholic Freeman's Journal felicitates itself, does the church boast of a prouder standing or a more onward march than it does under the stars and stripes.

SHOULD a pastor accept a call from a congregation which has not paid his predecessor, is a question of casuistry just propounded which admits of only one reply. If anybody needs salvation it is precisely that kind of flock. Go.—World.

"WHAT does the phrase, 'He isn't in it,' come from?" asks a subscriber. According to the best authorities it is attributed to Noah, who used the remark derisivly in referring to some profane person who had criticised the building of the ark.—Toledo News.

ABOUT eight hundred clergymen of this city will be summoned before the board of health in the course of a few days to show cause why they hav failed to report to the registrar nearly two thousand marriages which they hav celebrated within the past twelve months.—Philadelphia Record.

WRITES the author Edwin Johnson to the Herald: "We are confined between the ecclesiastical and the humanist aim, and hav been so for the last four hundred years. The enslavement of the imagination is the effect of ecclesiastical teaching, its emancipation that of the humanist. We shall ultimately travel back to the simplicity of idea and aim that distinguished the education of the old Greeks."

To the query, "What is the greatest known age that a human being has attained?" the Sun replies: "The Bible says that Methusaleh lived to be nine hundred and sixty-nine years old; but biblical commentators don't know whether to take this statement literally or not." Do they know whether to take any biblical statement literally or not?

REV. JOHN JASPER, the noted Richmond divine, still preaches his "sun-do-move" sermon, but only on occasions when requests for it are particularly numerous. There is a tacit understanding between the preacher and the public that when he delivers the celebrated sermon there shall be a more than ordinary output of coin when the contribution-box comes around.

THE Rome correspondent of an American Catholic paper writes: "The thing about the Vatican most hateful to the journals of the enemy is the Peter's pence. In short, they view with an evil eye this fact, that from all parts of the globe Catholics send money to the Vatican, while the finances of the state are struggling amid the greatest difficulties. They evidently desire that the holy father should be reduced to poverty."

"WE are glad to observe," says a Catholic paper, "that the Hungarian government has notified the holy see that it will not apply the Czacky decree in regard to mixed marriages. This decree ordered that the children of mixed marriages should be half of them baptized Catholics and half Protestants. To this the church could not consent. There can be no marriage between a Catholic and a Protestant, without the solemn and preliminary promis of both parties that all the children be baptized into the Catholic church and raised up as Catholics. There threatened to be a conflict at first, but it has been happily averted by the prudence of the government."

The whole civilized world, says the Catholic Review, waited for the pope's labor encyclical, "read it, commented upon it. Why? Because the civilized world is now pretty well acquainted with the social problem; it has learned to appreciate the fact that the pope leads the Catholic millions; and to understand that the pontiff's utterances are bound to hav an immense influence on these millions. It was once thought by the innocent non-Catholic that the loss of the temporal power meant the disappearance of the pope; the phenomenon of his continued and very prominent existence has now to be accounted for; and we hav no doubt that when the phenomenon has been explained to the satisfaction of non-Catholics, they will be clamorous partisans of the restoration of the temporal power."

"NEVER since Henry VIII.'s time," recounts a Mexican newspaper correspondent, "was there such a sacrilegious pillage, plunder, and ransacking as there was in Mexico shortly after the year 1857. Up to that date there had not been in any part of the world such splendid temples, and so richly decorated with articles of pure gold or silver, such as communion rails, crucifixes, chalices, remonstrances, pixes, book-stands, candlesticks, altar-bells, lamps, and so forth, everything of which fell a prey to the rapacity of sacrilegious mobs. Our immense churches, with an uninterrupted series of beautiful gilt altars all along the side walls, had more gold and silver in each one of them than one could find to-day in all the churches of the United States. But now everything has disappeared. Many of the churches were desecrated, the libraries removed, the land-titles sold out to swindlers, and the monasteries became barracks, theaters, or circuses."

THE report on the state of religion and morals in Scotland submitted to the general assembly is interesting, thinks the Sun. Football and cricket hav done great damage "by the Sabbath indolence and neglect of ordinances which exhausted nature exacts from their votaries." In one county "the pernicious custom of visiting friends and places of interest on the Lord's day is rapidly spreading." The preponderating sin in Morayshire is "frivolous and purely worldly conversation on the Lord's day." In Banffshire "the churches are losing the best and the most enterprising of their people, and are left with the aged, the lame, the blind, and the idiots, who could do nothing but remain." In Forfarshire "private baptism" has become very common, and in many rural districts "the entire alienation of farm servants from divine ordinances is a painful feature." In Fife, "the high wages now received by mere lads and girls tell against the morals and reverence of the rising generation," and many other causes "tend to the loosening of the bonds of church connection." The sin of "half-day hearing" on Sunday is increasing, and "a feeling of dissatisfaction prevails nearly everywhere as to attendance at prayer-meetings."

Immortality.

I was recently the recipient of a tract affirmativ of the question of immortality, by Mr. Parker Pillsbury, of Concord, N. H.

The presentation being gratuitous and the wrapper bearing the Concord postmark, I inferred that the donor was probably the author himself, in which instance I tender my thanks for the honor conferred.

I concede that Mr. Pillsbury has interpreted the Darwinian theory with commendable fidelity; but I fail to perceive what bearing the real can hav on the unreal, whether viewed in the light of fanciful analogy or otherwise. The evolution of man, even to the most ideal degree of perfection, by no means establishes the evolution or even the existence of the soul. Such romantic analogies doubtlessly entertain; but, while they charm, they also decoy, for they never instruct. The fertil theme of immortality has engaged the pens of poets and speculators since the earliest dawn of history; but those who deal exclusivly with facts hav either ignored the subject or treated it with contempt.

The solutions (?) of such airy problems are best consigned to the magic of the alchemist and the astrologer.

It has caused us a pang to part with the cherished yoke of our idol Gessler of the skies, but we are clearly gainers by the loss. The sacrifice of the soul must be made some day or science must decline. Why, therefore, should we entail an onerous and imperativ duty on coming generations that can be best performed by ourselvs? The masterly arguments of Reade and Bradlaugh against the probability of immortality and the possibility of Gods hav been frequently assailed with poetry but never with fact; and the sooner we awake from the dreams of childhood, the sooner will we realize the advantages of the only life for which we hav the faintest shadow of assurance. It is as ridiculous to hear a Deist or an immortalist as a Catholic denounce superstition. The god of Voltaire was a better god than Jehovah, because he more nearly resembled his inventor, Voltaire; but was he any more real? The "soul" that is forever freed from carnal fetters is a subject of more delightful contemplation than the servil "spirit" condemned to dance attendance on mediums, but it is not therefo re any the less false. So long as we continue to d scard one species of superstition with reluctance but to accept another with avidity we shall progress nevermore.

The author of the pamphlet in question seems momentarily to forget that the exalted matter which he so piously contrasts with primeval chaos will ultimately relapse into its original condition. He points with pardonable pride to the splendor of the dawning golden age, but sees not the inevitable and interminable night beyond.

Unless physicists and astronomers hav widely erred in their computations, our little orb has already touched its zenith as a life-producing planet and we may stand to-day on the verge of decline.

It is by no means a pleasant reflection to think of our remote ancestors as Esquimaux of the torrid zone shivering in their snow huts beneath the dim and cheerless rays of a vertical sun. Contrasted with eternity, by to-morrow this once imperial sphere will hav become as uninhabitable as its bleak and desolate satellite; by to-morrow its tenants will hav vanished and its "souls" forsaken their accustomed haunts. In his consideration of important problems Mr. Pillsbury neglects to demonstrate how mortal planets can produce immortal spirits; how the mechanism of mind can be preserved or reproduced by another form of matter than brain, or how a soul that once was not can always be. I agree with the author that immortality is a beautiful sentiment; but beautiful sentiments are as frequent characteristics of fiction as of truth. Mythology and immortality are of congenital origin, and though the former is more pernicious in effects, the latter is equally false.

I can neither speak nor conceive of the doctrin of immortality as an institution independent of religion. Of all superstitions it forms a cardinal and indispensable part; and the arguments in defense of either are founded alike on pure emotion, always repugnant to reason and always resembling the kindred chimeras of supernaturalism.

The endeavor to trace matter to mind, even if successful, would tend not to simplify, but to complicate; for mind is but an attribute of matter. Matter can exist independently of intelligence, but the independence of intelligence to matter is an absurdity.

Does not the indestructibility of matter, the conservation of energy, and the materiality of mind render the soul impossible and the Gods superfluous?

If pleasure is a proof of "intelligent and benevolent design," why is not pain a proof of divine ignorance and cruelty? If man's complexity is evidence of a designer, is not the still greater complexity of God a still stronger proof that he too was designed?

The ignorant cannot perceive the possibility of the evolution of higher from lower types, by processes however gradual and in periods however indefinit; though nature constantly illustrates the plasticity of her organisms in the improvement or deterioration of all forms of life, as well as in the evolutionary stages of fetal development. On the other hand, the learned cannot ascertain, nor can the sacred theorists explain, how man was developed, in one brief moment, from a handful of Jehovistic mud.

Whether so many useless rudiments survive as relics of a lower organization, or whether their inutility and utter want of adaptiv "design" serve as mementoes of a wise and practical God who "made nothing in vain," may be referred to the sanctified ones for solution; and at whatever conclusion they may arrive we shall not envy their choice of alternativs.

That all things, both the ridiculous and the sublime, hav their proper sphere, I venture not to dispute; but in my humble opinion the "proper sphere" of the nursery hero Jehovah and his little souls is the shop of the toy-dealer or the musty shelvs of the antiquarian.

Those who assume, contrary to science and unprejudiced human reason, the existence of Gods or the immortality of the soul, must sustain the burden of the proof. The lot of those who seek the "first cause," the edge of infinity, the dawn of eternity, the existence and destiny of souls, or the end of circles, may arouse our compassion but scarcely our envy.

It is undoubted that the origin of man long preceded the creation of Gods, the fable of immortality, the dream of heaven, and the invention of hell; may he long survive them. The hope that lends to death a downy couch and robs the grave of its dismal terrors is at the best an evanescent and a fascinating delusion, serve what purpose it may. It expires with life, to glow no more. The web of romance may span the blue ether, but the grave is the end of man.

If it be protested that death, as viewed by the Materialist, dissipates forever the joys of life, the rejoinder is that eternal oblivion likewise buries its woes. If the fe on's premature death rob "justice" of revenge, so in the haven of oblivion the just, the noble, are beyond that stoic realm where "man's inhumanity to man makes countless thousands mourn."

That eternal life is preferable to eternal death, proves nothing but the intensity and futility of human desire. That life under any conditions is preferable to physical death, does not lengthen the journey to the tomb.

Immortality is a matter of sentiment, not of reason; of faith, not philosophy.

That the misfortunes aud inequalities of life should be compensated as a sentiment is true; and that the offset to our ills on earth is not vouchsafed leads to the fallacious inference that indemnification will be granted in another world. But what is this sentiment but a proof of human compassion and an infamous accusation against the God whom we endeavor to adore? "If a God of infinit justice and boundless goodness permits suffering here, why not there?" (Underwood). If God is a fiend to-day, will he be a philanthropist to-morrow?

I assume not to protest that immortality is undesirable; but when has the presence of desire been the proof of attainment?

The ignis fatuus of a posthumous existence has served an expediency no longer present; for, though it may hav sustained the ferocity of the savage, it begets a callous indifference to a better life that has always been fatal to human happiness.

In proportion as men hav anticipated future compensation they hav increased their individual and national miseries in order to obtain proportionate redress; in proportion they hav disregarded this "life of probation;" in proportion they hav whiled away the precious hours of life in contemplation of ideal felicity; in proportion they hav neglected the spouse, forsaken the friend, and ignored the wretched, under the happy but baneful delusion that a beneficent God or an eternal soul would supply what their inhumanity rendered deficient.

The problem of morality must be solved by man alone; the spirits and the gods connive alike at virtue and at vice. The immortalist is unaware, perhaps, that, while he feigns to renounce selfishness, he embodies it as a sole and sordid incentiv to virtue—a future reward. How shall we express our contempt for mercenary morality!

That we cannot revive the dead, restore and perpetuate the amenities of life, inspires us to fill the golden cup of joy ere it vanish forever; that we can not repair the wrongs and compensate the ills of the departed, enjoins us not to procrastinate a benevolent deed with the prospect of future or vicarious fulfillment, but to render aid and solace during an only opportunity; that we cannot enter another realm and atone for worldly guilt, impels us here to win the virtuous applause of a pure and tranquil conscience; that we cannot love beyond the skies, prompts us here to foster the sublimest passions of the human heart.

I am loth to consider Mr. Pillsbury a votary of Spiritualism—sometimes in disguise as "impressible psychology," whatever effect this ambiguous character may exert on its destiny—partly because he does not so avow himself, and partly because I infer from the philosophic character of his disquisitions that his knowledge of human weakness is more than superficial. He is manifestly too well versed in psychology (not the "irrepressible" variety, however) to regard illusions and hallucinations as messengers from spirit-land, whether they frighten the timid in the guise of church-yard ghosts or amuse our modern Hamlets in the role of departed kinsmen.

I readily concur with Brother Wettstein that soul-production must be limited; that terrestrial force and matter must suffer diminution in proportion to the evolution of these mystic elves, in which case, not only our own tiny planet but all gross matter would hav long since disappeared; and, in addition, that those spirits which hav a beginning must also hav an end.

How man can become spirit; or, in plainer terms, how the visible can become invisible and yet retain the attributes of the visible, is to the pure Materialist a shadowy problem.

Mr. Wettstein and myself (for my friend I vouch on assumption) will be very grateful to the spiritual embassadors if they will kindly explain by what artifice the spirits defy the attraction of gravity. We should likewise be pleased to learn of what their thinking apparatus consists and how its presence in the body has so long eluded the eye of the anatomist and the lens of the microscope; or, in the event of its departure immediately after death, how it has so artfully obliterated all traces of its occupancy.

If the character of the "spirit" is derived from the character of the living body—and on this evidently depends their diversity—it is self-evident that the "spirit" is subject even to slight modifications of body and brain during life; why, then, is it yet exempt from the incomparably greater modification of death? If brain is the organ of mind, which none deny, by what process of metamorphosis does the "soul" survive the destruction of its sole and essential factor? Mind, like light and heat, sound and color, is but a mode of motion. When we sleep, the pulsations of the brain are abated in force and diminished in frequency, and mental action is correspondingly imperfect. At death its activity forever ceases, its motion is lost, and hence its attribute mind has vanished; and to assume the continuation of mind in another phase, is to assert the existence of an effect without a cause. None are so stupid as to ask what becomes of the peculiar motion of a pendulum that has stopped, of a stone impeded in its fall, or of a tongue that has ceased to wag; but we constantly hear the equally preposterous question, what becomes of mind when the motion of its organ is no more?

If spirits are immortal, they must be eternal; and if eternal, each one must hav awaited the advent of the body which it was predestined to occupy, for half an eternity, if I may so express an incalculable period of the past. If their predestination be denied, it must be admitted that their affinity is governed by chance; and if by chance they endow us with immortality, by chance they may also fail to render many of us this service.

The spirit, entering the body at conception or at birth (the moment, point, and manner of its access is not even assumed by those who profess so thoroughly to understand the incomprehensible), has neither brought nor retained any knowledge whatever of its vast experience; how, then, can it become so superior to itself when, after briefly inhabiting an otherwise inanimate body, it returns to its normal condition? If, on the contrary, the soul comes into existence with life itself, how can it survive when those conditions without which its existence would hav been impossible, hav been withdrawn?

The soul, exclaim the knowing ones, governs both body and mind; and yet my soul persists at this moment in denying its very existence. Is the immortal soul a hypocrit, a jester, or a liar? Can our spiritual gnostics solve this problem with their alchemy?

Responsiv to the delicate insinuation of Joseph Mesmer, Jr., in the issue of May 23d, I beg to remind him that the age of oracles has passed. If my "pedantry" be fallacious, I suggest that he prove rather than assert it; otherwise he may himself incur the opprobrium which he seeks to bring upon an opponent. Were my critic but half so skeptical of "spirit manifestations" as he is of the manifestations of mortals, I apprehend that he would hav long since been excommunicated for spiritual heresy. The superannuated and moss-covered plea that bogus spirits alone hav hitherto revealed themselvs to the uninitiated, and that genuin spooks never are, but always to be, interviewed, is the identical echo awakened by the first exposure; and, like the fabled soul itself, it seems to be immortal. I shall not contest Mr. Mesmer's right to denounce those as "ignorant" who differ with him in opinion; for it is his special privilege, I presume, to measure all men with his own standard. Should he ever be so injudicious as to consult Sully's "Illusions," or any other recent standard work on psychology, quoted in my third communication, all of which expose the alleged phenomena of Spiritism, he may ascertain that the ranks of "ignorance" are crowded with the most eminent scientists and philosophers of the age. I meekly admit my dense "ignorance" of the subtle art of "mesmeric impressions," having "taken lessons"—and applied them—in this field but ten years, and having access to only forty-two volumes elucidativ of magnetism, alias "impressible psychology" whatever havoc this cabalistic jargon may hav played with the science in recent times.

During my visit to New York in September next, I shall leave my address at the office of THE TRUTH SEEKER, that Monsieur "Mesmer" and his fellow-savants may avail themselvs of the opportunity of publicly exposing, at some convenient séance, that "ignorance" so detrimental to myself and so obnoxious to the apparitionists. Meanwhile I may entertain the additional hallucination that honesty assumes no disguise and a manly controversialist no nom de plume.

Our Spiritualistic and Theosophical essayists are very sedulous in avoiding such interesting topics as the power of the imagination and the effects of magnetism in connection with their favorit recreation, though they frequently admit the apathy of the martyr to depend on the former and the efficacy of the imposition of hands upon the latter.

The most notable of hallucinations recorded in ancient mock-literature are those of the exile and "revelator," St. John, which, though discredited by "Spiritologists" and topers, were undoubtedly the result either of "clairvoyance" or alcoholic delirium. Both skepticism and credulity may be excessiv; and concerning the universal reluctance to admit a damaging fact, I can but recall the ancient adage that "facts may deny what sages themselvs cannot refute."

The ipse dixits of our Spiritualistic polemics are irresistibly convincing; and in their charming citation of self-evident facts many of them almost rival the genius of Esop and St. John.

The mere audacity of those who pose as celestial couriers is itself almost as superhuman as the miracles which they pretend to perform, while their egotism has been equaled only by that of the Bethlehem peripatetic who considered himself authorized to confiscate a jackass without either the knowledge or consent of the legal owner.

The "overweening conceit" of a semi-celestial character at present incognito, suggests its parallel in that of the Grecian god who, first perceiving his reflection in a pool of water as he stooped to drink, became so infatuated with his imaginary beauty that he petrified in the very act and attitude of self-adoration.

Did it ever occur to the enlightened ones that, while they are ostensibly so eager to submit their prodigies to public inspection, the very conditions which they impose on the examiner are calculated to discourage investigation and excite suspicion? Professing to aid the vision and assist the judgment, they insist on obscuring the one and perverting the other. The demand for twilight investigators and judges who shall reserve their decision until they shall hav become psychologically intoxicated, is notoriously in excess of the supply. It is respectfully suggested that investigators (?) of such phenomena (!) equip themselvs, not with dark lanterns, but with teething-rings and nursing-bottles.

It may be safely assumed that the spirits and the gods are invisible to the vulgar gaze of the profane because, per se, they dwell within, not without, the human eye; and an additional analogy between religion and Spiritism rests on the mutual taxation of human credulity. Both systems dispose of spiritual commodities for financial considerations; and, though it has been computed that the dispensation of "free salvation" in this happy land involves an annual expenditure of $2,500,000, popular statistics do not inform us whether the spirits are a less expensiv luxury.

Why the miracles of mediums test our faith with any less severity than those of the mythical Galilean conjurer, has never been made sufficiently clear. Indeed, whether infant minds in ancient bodies are as frequently found in "circles" as in pews seems no longer a question of debate. The exploits of Jehovah and Jack the Giant Killer, of Mother Goose and Dis Debar, bear a striking resemblance to each other, and faintly arouse the suspicion of a common origin. A patient and critical comparison of mortals and immortals may finally enable us to realize the seeming paradox that gods are made in the image of men and that souls and spirits are fairies in disguise.

In the spirits power and impotence are strangely blended. Enabled to traverse continents and seas with the velocity of lightning, to master a hundred alien languages instantaneously, to withstand the intense frigidity and the rarity of the ether, to overcome atmospheric resistance in their impetuous flights, and to oppose, with marvelous impunity, the laws of gravitation, they are yet unable to "manifest" themselvs otherwise than through proxy—a la Jehovah! Furthermore, these airy phantoms seem to be almost as superstitious as their devotees themselvs. They are perfectly infatuated with anything in the shape of a circle, but are as shy of angular objects as a Texas broncho.

It is reported (not by spiritologists, however), that the ghost of Lincoln was recently "materialized" at Chicago, New Orleans, and San Francisco during the same evening. It thus appears that in spirit land Mr. Lincoln is as famous a pedestrian as on earth he was a railsplitter. This is by no means astonishing; for it is not an uncommon feat for a spirit to become proficient as a slate-writer who, as a mortal, was utterly ignorant of the vulgar art of penmanship. We often hear the modest assertion that our contemporaries converse with Aristotle and other ancients who flourished on earth centuries before the invention of the Anglo-Saxon tongue: and, were it not so disrespectful of the favored few, we might question how they hav acquired such fluency in modern languages as to contradict themselvs and each other on every possible occasion. The spirits are of historic renown, not alone as amanuenses, but as poetic muses; and it was they, no doubt, who inspired the erotic madrigals of Solomon when that virtuous monarch occupied the editorial chair of the Jerusalem Police Gazette.

In every age Materialists hav rendered themselvs both odious and infamous by denying that the immutable laws of nature are wantonly violated for the spiritual or pecuniary benefit of mediums, to whom Dame Nature is always an obsequious handmaid; for, as we all know, belief is but an article of merchandise, ever at the command of the highest bidder.

We "know" that the soul is real; for somebody heard that somebody said that somebody dreamed that somebody saw a human soul. We know that the soul is real; for men of piety and men of veracity hav seen such things in bygone days; and our postmaster-general, our asylum psychologists, and our revelers at the festal board see them to-day.

But, unfortunately for the benighted Secularist, the affinity of the soul for dreamers is as inveterate as the partiality of the Red sea toward the Hebrew marauders.

We should be more inclined to dispute the "advantage of Spiritualism" among the enlightened than to deny the efficacy of Christianity among the "heathen," which latter was once made manifest to me by the remarkable conversion of an emigrant pagan.

As the provinces of both institutions are so intimately related, and as the spiritual harvest in each field is so flattering to the mutual cause, I shall briefly digress to relate the happy incident. During a "revival" in a Stockton street God-shop in San Francisco some years ago, an ungodly Mongol was enticed from his joss-house and ushered into the sacred fold. Tragic recitations and hallelujah antics being the order of the day, Brother Wan Lung speedily caught the contagion, and proceeded thus to expatiate on the felicity of salvation: "Oh! me heepee lubbee Jee eli! Hip la! Fi, fi! God d——n! Alle same Melican man!"

The question, what shall we wear when we inhabit the frigid ether, is rather too indelicate to merit a reply. Suffice it to insinuate that, being invisible to a normal eye, our garb will be somewhat gauzy, not even so substantial a protection as a fig-leaf. This tenuity of raiment will account for our disinclination to appear during the honest hours of daylight; for should we thus indecently expose our persons, we should merit the disapprobation of Comstock and shock the modesty of our feminin friends. Concerning our vocation, however, we are at no loss to conceive. It is obvious that our posthumous independence will be even more greatly curtailed by mediums than are our physical liberties by the despotism of tyrants and the intolerance of Christians.

However intense may be our desire to converse with our kindred and friends, we must calmly await their conversion to the "circle" before we can gratify our most ardent aspirations. Imagin our delight when we are enforced by spiritual circumstances to ignore our anxious friends and communicate with those who, while we were incarnate, only provoked our disgust!

The worldly ones may well envy our felicity when contemplating an impending disaster, unforeseen by those who are to be involved in its ruin, and who are unable to anticipate and avoid it because we are not empowered by our mediums to forewarn them.

Tied throughout all eternity to the apron strings of mediums, ever at their command to flatter the weak and beguile the wise, to juggle with furniture and earn an honest (!) dollar, the life of a "fellow-citizen on high" is invidious indeed. Our professions will be legerdemain, our ends pecuniary, and our reputation—spiritual, of course. Like our fellow-unfortunate, Jehovah, we may assess our devotees to the full extent of their temporal assets; but while our representativs on earth fulfill the letter of our capitation, they appropriate to themselvs the proceeds, and leave us nothing but the empty honor and authority of having imposed the tribute. We will, moreover, endure the mortification of being continually referred to by skeptics under the generic and unromantic term, imagination. Many will doubt our existence and many more impeach our integrity; and we will labor under the double disability of being ourselvs unable to refute such charges while our inventors are equally incompetent of sustaining our mutual pretensions.

Among the irreverent masses, none will be wanting to compare our resurrection with that of the fabulous juggler of Nazareth; and even some may suspect that we, in affinity with our illustrious prototype, the Holy Ghost, may also "manifest" a decided penchant for innocent (?) and unsuspecting Jewish maidens; but since the introduction of shot-guns, however, our sovereign ghost has diminished the frequency of his "overshadowing" expeditions in proportion to the increasing severity of paternal vigilance; and we shall profit by the example.

One grand consolation remains, after all; with whatever ills and disadvantages we may be encumbered during our post-mortem career, we shall at least avail ourselvs of the glorious opportunity of haunting death-beds of Moralists, and spreading terror and woe among the disconsolate survivors.

But when the solemn hour of our own demise approaches, we shall not dwell upon such materialistic thoughts as dissolution and personal annihilation, but remember that, in the cheerful language of the Arkansaw poet, "there's a land that beats hell out o' this."

Prayer.

One of your contributors seems to repudiate the evidences of design in creation, and this has stimulated me into an examination into this serious subject. It is vast in its dimensions, the outgrowth of which is, Who and where is the designer? It seems evident that all created things are—so far as we can observe—controled by inflexible laws. The violation of any one brings certain retribution; not as the consequence of impious sin, but as the sequence of the infringement of some other law.

Some minds would stop here, and declare every transaction the effect of evolution. But this is unsatisfactory to the writer, who is still anxious, if possible, to trace the architect of these inflexible laws—if possible to the habitation of the designer.

As my comprehension or mental eye-sight expands, it ceases to confine itself to this planet, when thousands of worlds move around in planetary space, nor thinks the designer confined alone to this comparativly paltry ball, when thousands are within telescopic distance, moving with inconceivable accuracy and speed in their various orbits. The Jewish Bible in its very limited and infantil history of creation says, "And he made the stars also."

I hav reflected much of late on this subject, and am as far from its full comprehension as ever; but at one thing I am filled with disgust—the fashionable ignorance of our popular religions on the subject of prayer. Prayers for what? To implore the great designer to arrest the operations of these inflexible laws to mitigate our sufferings for our ignorances, follies, and blunders.

Several incidents come afresh into my mind as I reflect on the folly of prayers and the expectation of their being answered. Your late subscriber Daniel Mason had a pious father and mother, and it grieved them much that their son Daniel was so obtuse as to reject the mysteries of religion and substitute reason. Daniel loved his parents, and therefore in compliance with their wishes sought to please them in venting his soul in prayer. He retired to their wood-shed in the rear of their garden, closed its door, vented his soul in vociferation, and ended with a fervent Amen! He arose, paused, looked around him, and deliberately ejaculated to himself, "There, Dan Mason, if you can't make a better prayer than that you ought to go to hell—if there is one!" Still there was a mystery in prayer Daniel could not surmount; it was so popular in usage. Through the daily press Mr. Henry Ward Beecher announced that on the coming Sabbath his discourse would be on "The Benefit and Necessity of Daily Prayer." The opportunity was too good to be lost, and Mr. Mason availed himself of the chance. The reverend gentleman's discourse was wordy if not eloquent. The summary was, he prayed because it made him feel good!

Mr. Mason died but a few years ago, aged eighty-three. He had a call from a Mrs. Archer, an estimable lady of the Methodist persuasion, the day preceding his death. "Mr. Mason," asked the lady, "are you a Christian?" Mr. Mason replied, "Mrs. Archer, I should not like to be thought a Christian." "But you believe in the Bible, Mr. Mason?" "Mrs. Archer, it is evident you hav never read that book or you would never ask a dying man such a question. The Bible—yes, I do believe it to be the most filthy and the most damnable book of morals ever placed before a thinking people!"

At the funeral which took place the next day, "Of one thing I am sure," said Mrs. Archer, "Mr. Mason was not afraid to die."

DAVID BRUCE.

A Voice from Maryland.

We publish, by permission, the following extracts from a letter written us by one of our activ and valued members, Mr. E. Livezey, of Baltimore:

I like the circular [Flag and Pansy leaflet] you sent me very much. It is strong and to the point, without being offensiv to any. In my poor effort, I had to yield a little to superstition in order to get before the public. Your circular is strong, and should be appreciated by all Liberals. . . .

I am trying to stir up our Farmers' Granges and Alliances in this state, in the matter of "taxing all and exempting none." Some of the Granges hav responded by passing resolutions against exemptions. I hav written some strong letters to them showing that the heavy burden of taxation resting on them is caused by the many exemptions. An appeal to his interest is the way to get the farmer over. And if our Freethought papers would take the matter up—send strong articles to all the Farmers' Granges and Alliances—we should hav a powerful influence brought to bear on the political parties all over the United States, that would help us in the matter of taxing church property and all other private and sectarian institutions. Although we know no party, we must make ourselvs heard and felt in the political struggles between the two great parties. Now is the accepted time to work upon them, and get the influence of the Farmers' Granges and Alliances. Show the farmers they are paying more than their fair and honest portion of taxes, because of unjust legislation in the matter of exemption, and they will be our helpers. Let us come down to practical work, and meet the questions of the day.

This letter has the right ring, and we commend it to the consideration of such of our people as are anxious to bring about speedy and practical results in state secularization. The taxation of churches is a point on which we can get many and many an orthodox Protestant farmer to work with us. If we can get his help in securing this, the first of our Nine Demands, shall we not avail ourselvs of such help?

Mr. Livezey is doing an excellent work in Baltimore and the surrounding country, in preaching against the injustice of exempting churches. Not long since, he gave an able address on this subject before the Taxpayers' Association, which the leading daily papers of Baltimore published in full and commented on editorially. A great danger threatens Maryland, and, through it, the whole country, in a pending constitutional amendment to exempt churches under the state constitution, and thus lift the matter of their liability to taxation beyond the reach of local legislation. The Jesuits, to a man, favor this step. With church property in Maryland exempted by constitutional enactment, an enduring foundation will hav been laid for a union of church and state, upon which the Catholic church will not fail to rear a splendid and well-fortified superstructure.

Meanwhile, what is the American Secular Union doing to prevent this grave danger which threatens our religious liberties? It sends its "Church Taxation" pamphlets wherever it sees an effectiv opening. It is encouraging Mr. Livezey in his noble volunteer work all it can, and supplying him and other Maryland members of the American Secular Union with pamphlets for distribution. When it hears of a Liberally-inclined Marylander, it seizes on him, puts our "Church Taxation" pamphlet into his hands, and says, in effect: "Work to save your state!" But, alas! Maryland Liberals are few and far between, and Catholics are thick as blackberries. Would that more of our people would come forward to strengthen Mr. Livezey's hands at this important crisis!

Mr. Livezey's suggestion of trying to win the Farmers' Granges and Alliances over to see the injustice worked to them by exemption of churches is excellent, and should be acted on, not only by Liberals in Maryland, but in other states as well. The industrial situation is the burning question of the hour; and it behooves those of us who would make state secularization a political issue, to be up and stirring to interest industrial reformers everywhere in the justice of our demands. To this end let us make sure that all the labor organizations are as thoroughly inoculated as possible with the principles of the Nine Demands of Secularism. If we cannot get the whole loaf right off, do let us take a piece of the loaf with thanks, and work patiently and steadily for another piece and another, until the whole of the Nine Demands shall be ours. This suggestion of Mr. Livezey's is a very important one, and we hope that our Liberal friends everywhere will act on it promptly, and do what they can to win the industrial societies over to a perception of the importance of separating church and state. Our cause is a just one, and, in most cases, needs only to be presented to other reformers to secure their hearty approval and coöperation.

Let every member of the American Secular Union, then, consider himself or herself a committee of one to influence some labor organization gradually with the principles for which the American Secular Union is working. Circulate our "Church Taxation" pamphlets to clinch what you say. Don't try for too much at once; work the ground thoroughly for church taxation first, and then move ahead to another of the Nine Demands. This is the plan on which Mr. Livezey is working, and thus every stroke of his is effectiv. How many of you will act on his suggestion?

IDA C. CRADDOCK,
Corr. Sec. American Secular Union.

Philadelphia, July 10, 1891.

Mr. Swartz in His Own Behalf.

In your issue of July 4th, I notice that you devote a column to the discussion of my case, your remarks being called forth by some observations of E. C. Walker in Liberty of recent date anent my arrest on the charge of circulating sensational literature. Knowing of old the reputation of THE TRUTH SEEKER for honesty and fairness, I beg this space to correct a few misstatements in regard to the facts in the case, and set myself in a proper light before your readers.

In the first place, your Western correspondent, when he says, "The Kansas City Sunday Sun is a sheet devoted exclusivly to social scandal," is guilty of a deplorable perversion of truth; but it does not come within the province of my present purpose to discuss the character of the publication; the principle involved in the attempts at its suppression remains unaltered by its contents.

Like most others who attempt to justify the interference of legalized authority with what can be but the affair of the individual, you confound the right to sell whatever some one else wants to buy, and consequently the right to publish and disseminate whatever a person chooses, with the palpable abuse of such freedom by a libel. No one can more detest libel or slander, or be more willing to make reparation for such, unintentionally published, than myself (or the Sun); but in my case that charge is not preferred. The alleged offense is, according to the indictments, "the circulation of a newspaper devoted principally to the publication of criminal news," which hinges the fight on the freedom of the press from a censorship instituted by Comstock and his abettors, who were the instigators of the law under which I am prosecuted, and which was passed by the recent Farmers' Alliance legislature of this state. The question of libel or of malicious defamation does not enter into the controversy, and no one can show, or has attempted to show, that he or she has been injured by the publication of the newspaper which I circulated. I certainly hav "no moral right to injure other people," nor hav I done so. Whenever it is shown that I hav, I shall do all in my power to right the wrong. And you certainly speak without a knowledge of the facts when you say that the interference of the government "to protect the libeled from the libeler seems in the case of Mr. Swartz to be perfectly justified."

It is easily to be seen that in my case, as in many similar ones that might be mentioned, it is a press censorship that is being exercised, although you say you believe there should be none of that. If the list of newspapers that circulate in this state is to be narrowed down to those that are not, in the estimation of the ordinary jury, "immoral, indecent, or devoted principally to the publication of criminal news," as the statute referred to reads, how long is it likely to be until some accidental aggregation of twelve bigoted religionists will decide that THE TRUTH SEEKER is immoral? Is it not evident to you that there can be but one occasion for the restriction of publication, and that actual invasion by the dissemination of falsehood and slander?

This case is similar to those of Lucifer and the Word. In neither of these has any injured party appeared against the defendant; but Heywood is in the Massachusetts state prison with a two years' sentence half served, and Harman has six years of the same punishment hanging over his head. Nor has my offense been greater—or less. Bennett, Harman, and Heywood libeled no one, and they were imprisoned; I hav circulated naught but the truth—does the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER think I should be imprisoned?

Personally, I hav no sympathy whatever with those who meddle with the private affairs of others, or who act as "backdoor sneaks to rake up scandal," and I consider them the most detestable of vampires; but I do defend the right of the Sunday Sun, THE TRUTH SEEKER, Lucifer, or any other paper, to publish and circulate whatsoever it pleases, so long as that publication be not maliciously slanderous. Did I do less than this I should be false to the philosophy of freedom, lacking in respect for the rights of my fellow-man, and unheedful of the promptings of an honest heart.

C. L. SWARTZ.

Topeka, Kan., July 8, 291.

Our London Letter.

The confession of faith recently published by thirty members of the Baptist community, in which Mr. C. H. Spurgeon leads the signatures, is a curious instance of theological stagnation; for while all the other sections of the Protestant church are giving signs of their progress toward complete emancipation from old-fashioned dogmas, this particular sect glories in the fact that it is absolutely at a standstill. The subscribers to this remarkable document are to be commiserated, in that they are so perfectly satisfied by remaining in the gross darkness of superstition and desire nothing better, while on the other hand they may be commended for taking their stand and openly stating what they do believe, unlike the vast majority of clerics, who will preach anything for which they are paid, and being without any particular form of belief, it is impossible to pin them down to anything; for while professing to be always ready to defend the Christian religion from the attacks of avowed unbelievers, they are the most unsatisfactory opponents to be found, wriggling about, making concessions when expedient, and continually shifting ground, but the hard-and-fast Calvinist maintains his position to the best of his ability, and at all events gives you something to grapple with. It is rather unfortunate that Mr. Spurgeon, with all his faith, backed by the prayers of his large congregation, cannot improve the state of his health, and with all his loud professions of faith has to call in the help of medical science, which certainly appears somewhat inconsistent, as, if he believed the "word of God" so strongly as he says he does, he ought to rest satisfied with James's prescription for sickness.

Poor old Dr. Keims has come to the front again with another of his marvelous scientific-biblical works. If he were not so puffed up with self-conceit he would speedily withdraw the book from circulation, for it has been most unmercifully criticised, and the best his friends can do is to "damn it with faint praise." I question whether the sale will anyway meet the cost of production, for anyone who took the trouble to read his "Moses and Geology" would not spend a penny in the purchase of his latest effusion. Luckily for him, he has a snug little income in a city church living, or the erstwhile schoolmaster would find it difficult to provide himself with the bare necessaries of life.

The government scheme of free education, although very crude and imperfect, is a step in the right direction, and will, by a more democratic Parliament, be put in better shape; but already it is much abused by the Romish party, who fear they will lose much of their control over the education of the young. When the time comes, and it may not be long to wait, that public school education will be purely secular, a fearful howl will be set up by the entire clerical party, and all creeds will join to oppose it, but by that time their united power will be unable to continue the yoke.

The poverty of the minor clergy has been under discussion in the "Lower House of Convocation." One wealthy cleric considers it is mainly caused by improvident managers, but as Archdeacon Farrar says that the majority of men ordained must remain curates all their lives, and after forty years of age find it difficult to find employment, the unfortunate cleric must remain single, unless he can find a woman who can afford to keep him, and celibate clergymen are not very desirable acquisitions in a parish. Those holding rich livings are not willing to giv of their wealth to assist their poorer brethren, but are always whining for the laity to subscribe; but the laity are getting wiser than formerly, and strongly object to do any more than pay what the law compels. After all, it is difficult to see why any clergyman should receive any thing more than a nominal salary, for the life is generally a very idle one, the clergy being non-producers and as hungry as locusts. The majority of them are unfitted for any other calling, and are only wastrels.

At the Radical Club.

The entertainment given at the Radical Club, as announced in the last issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER, was a decided success. There was fine music, singing, and a solo dance, and the occasion ended with a social dance and refreshments.

The speaker of the evening, Mr. Wakeman, gave a necessarily condensed but highly interesting discourse upon the evolution of poetry and music. He started with ancient Greece, and stated that in the kingdom of Sparta was born the lyric-epic, in which the poets sang of valor, praising him who gave his blood for his country's honor. This patriotic enthusiasm found its brightest example in Leonidas and his Three Hundred defending the pass of Thermopylæ against the Asiatic hordes of Xerxes, and caused the rise of all Greece. In Athens love and woman were added to the poet's list of subjects. And in pagan Athens we almost for the first time find woman regarded as something more than a drudge. The only preceding instance of an equal elevation of woman was in Egypt, where she had for a long time enjoyed a liberty and equality which she has not since regained. Passing from Athens, Mr. Wakeman took his audience to Rome; then pointed out the beneficent influence of Christianity upon the development of music, and that by the introduction of the organ that religion reached its highest pinnacle. He pointed out how the psalms of Luther, like the lyrics of Goethe, of Burns, and of Moore, were but ancient tunes to which the poets gave new words, new ideas. He spoke about Shakspere, Shelley, Byron, and Keats. Turning to France, he called attention to the fact that while in Greece and Rome the burden of the national song-literature had been "Victory or Death" that of the French Revolution was "Liberty or Death." Turning to America, he said that our literature is the best, the broadest, a literature of hope and promis. While speaking of America he stated that the English language is the only one that has a word for home, the one coming nearest it in this point being the German, with the adjectiv heim. In saying this, however, Mr. Wakeman fell into error, as both the Danish noun Hjem and the Swedish hemmat express exactly the same sentiment as the English word "home."

Among the ladies and gentlemen who took a prominent part in the evening's entertainment we must mention Miss F. Moore and Mr. Hancock, who rendered an excellent duet on violin and piano. Mr. Brunswick, in illustration of German music, sang Heine's "Lorelei" and one of Luther's psalms. Miss Marie Louise, the well-known French Communist, dressed in Revolutionary costume with red cap and short sleeves, and carrying a red banner, sang "La Marseillaise" in French, and the audience joined in the chorus. But the star of the evening, judging from the applause, was Miss Emma Wildermuth, who in a clear voice sang "Auld Lang Syne," and afterward treated the company to a very graceful skirt dance to the same tune. Miss R. Moore, in a rich and mellow soprano, rendered an Irish song in a pleasing way. Miss Kunz read a selection in a very acceptable manner; and Miss Kinget and Mr. Abelson gave a duet, a sample of American lyric poetry. The exercises were concluded by two gentlemen whose names were not announced, but whose singing was excellent and called forth hearty applause.

Other entertainments will follow, and the Radicals of the city should not fail to make a call at the club, the home of New York Radicals, 37 Clinton place.

Items of Foreign Freethought News.

The social question is to be made a plank in the Swedish Freethinkers' platform.

Agitation clubs and open-air meetings are used extensivly by Swedish Freethinkers as a means of spreading the truth.

The annual congress of the Belgian Freethought Association will be held August 15th and 16th, in Minard's Theater, Gand, Belgium.

A new Freethought society, with Napoleon Navez, ex-president of the Belgian Federation, as president, has been started at Mons, Belgium.

According to the last census there were in the province of Haag, Holland, 7,913 nominal church-members and 1,081 persons who had no religion.

Some time ago we informed our readers of the judgment rendered by a minor court against Mr. Rich. Erth-Schneeberg for blasphemy. The verdict, six months' imprisonment, has been affirmed by the supreme court.

We hope the announcement in the last number of the Freireligiöses Sonntags-Blatt that with the close of this year the paper will cease to exist, will not prove true. Dr. Voelkel's paper is one of our best exchanges, and is always newsy, entertaining, and instructiv.

In the room of each of the Belgian Freethought societies there is a contribution-box labeled, "For Orphans of Freethinking Parents." From June 1st to June 20th 255 francs were donated. "Go thou and do likewise," we are tempted to say to our Secular Unions.

According to the late census of Austria there are in Vienna 1,195,167 Catholics, 41 943 Protestants, 118,495 orthodox Hebrews, and 8,000 Freethinkers; the number of the latter in all Austrian provinces is 18,000. But how many there are, who dare not say so, the census does not state.

Editor Baginsky, of Reichenbach, has been sentenced to six months' imprisonment for a blasphemous article directed against a minister of the Prussian state church. The Schweidnitzer Täglichen Rundschau, a very orthodox official paper, in commenting hereupon says that the full penalty of the law should be enforced against those who spurn the true faith and harrass the holders of ecclesiastic offices.

American Freethinkers wishing to contribute to the fund which is being raised for Mrs. Voelkel and her children are respectfully requested to address their donations by international money order or check to Theodor Werner, Magdeburg-Buckau, Wanzleberstrasse. Mr. Warner is cashier of the Freethought society of that city and is authorized. All sums received will be published in the Freireligiöses Sonntags-Blatt.

The editor of Friedländer Boten, who at the recent census signed himself a Freethinker, has, to make sure of people's knowing what kind of man he is, made the following declaration in his paper: "Hereby I announce my secession from the Evangelic-Lutheran church, to which I belonged by birth and teaching during childhood, but to which I for a long time, through a pursuit of scientific study, hav become a total stranger. Otto Heinrichs, Friedland, Mecklenburg-Schwerin." It would be well did every Freethinker possess so much moral courage.

In the Kingdom of God.

In the kingdom of God his chosen ones dwell,
And they are a sweet-scented crew,
Old Adam and Enoch and Noah and Ham,
If the Bible is true.

In the kingdom of God you can mingle with Lot,
And meet his two daughters there too,
And hear the sweet stories that they can relate,
If the Bible is true.

And Judah is there in that kingdom of bliss,
His daughter-in-law's present too,
To tell to the ransomed her strange escapades,
If the Bible is true.

High up in the councils Miss Rahab is seen,
A harlot from Jericho who Betrayed to their foes her neighbors and friends,
If the Bible is true.

In that beautiful realm a hero abides,
Old Samson, who followed and slew
The Philistine hosts with the jaw of an ass,
If the Bible is true.

And Jonah, the prophet of God, liveth there,
Who told of a gourd-vine that grew,
Who lodged in a whale for three days and three nights,
If the Bible is true.

King David is there, and Uriah also,
And Bath-Sheba's stopping there too,
All living in peace in the kingdom of God,
If the Bible is true.

And the wisest of men, King Solomon, 's there,
With his wives and his concubines, who
Inspired his gay songs which our children must read,
If the Bible is true.

Ye saints of the Lord, ye ransomed of God,
Ye Christians, ye orthodox few,
Imagin a life in this kingdom of God,
If the Bible is true!

Pure women and maids who lived undefiled
In this world of the devil's, will you
Fly to the arms of David or Lot,
If the Bible is true?

Will you walk through the streets of the city of God
With Jacob or Judah and view
The spirits of those whose lusts were as fire,
If the Bible is true?

O Honor, O Virtue, O Truth, let us stay
This giant of evil, and shew
To the eyes of the innocent children of men
That this Bible is false and untrue.

A Queer Advertisment.

From the Bicycling World.

Heresy is a crime that cannot be too violently dealt with. When a man becomes so depraved as to believe only that which looks reasonable to him, and honest enough to say what that is, he should be taken out and blown from the mouth of a cannon (now that burning at the stake is no longer considered the proper thing).

Men who think real thoughts should not be permitted to run at large lest they teach others, and "the fruit of the tree of knowledge" should never be put on the free list. Now that truth has gotten so weak that when crushed to earth it might not be able to rise again, great care should be taken to prevent the sun shining on it.

When that estimable gentleman dropped dead in Detroit the other day while defending orthodoxy, the cause was understood to be an abnormal condition of the heart; but had it been some profane man who died while saying naughty words, we fear that some of our clerical friends might hav misconstrued the cause and the motiv.

When civilization gets to be worthy the name, society (i. e., the people) will hav at least a profound sympathy for the man who thinks, and will blame him only when he refuses to giv the world the benefit of his thought. Truth cannot suffer, but must ultimately stand at the masthead when error is not even on deck. When it is learned that facts caanot be rubbed out, and that nothing else can be forever bolstered up by no matter whom; when honesty and brotherly love shall stand above cant and formality; when man shall know that his highest duty to God is to use, to the best advantage, such gifts as God has given him; and that there can be no heresy or sectarianism in relation to anything of which the world has positiv knowledge; when manliness and love of humanity shall take the place of selfish fear and unreasoning faith in unsupported dogmas, then we shall not be nauseated by the spectacle of five hundred able-bodied men (for the sustenance of whom somebody has to saw wood) spending their time haggling over the question of whether an honest brother shall be allowed to progress. When it is understood that there is more religion in avoiding these contentions than there can possibly be in anything which, by its obscurity, could be the subject of contention; when men cease to allow their anxiety about the unknown or unknowable to seriously interfere with their enjoyment of the known; when children are taught only such things as are known to their instructors, and allowed to do their own guessing; when parents are honest enough to admit their ignorance of matters about which they hav no right to know; when a man shall not be cast out of a religious organization because he shows symptoms of having brains and a desire to use them; when dying capitalists who leave money to found institutions of learning shall not insist that they be anchored to their own tombstones, and that their beneficiaries shall agree not to learn more than they themselvs knew; when the truth shall stand above any man's conception of the truth, then will the world be brighter, better, purer, and more fit for human occupancy, and its people may die in the full knowledge that they hav done their best as to what they knew, unhampered by heedless worry over what they couldn't find out.

P.S.—The above may seem rather a novel advertisment for Hickory Bicycles, but the fact is, our advertising man has read so much in the newspapers about heresy during the past week that this was all we could get out of him.

The "Good Old Times" for the Clergy.

Chauncey Depew in His Fourth of July Oration.

I hav no sympathy and only contempt for watery patriotism. I know men who invest abroad because they see the shadow of an Anarchy and Communism which is to touch their possessions. I know men who liv abroad to get out from under the American avalanche. I hope they will never return. [Applause.] We neither want them, nor do we want the offspring of such stock. What are our perils? In comparison with what we hav gone through and overcome they are nothing. Our dyspeptic friends talk about the glory of the old time and how we hav fallen away in memory and in morals. Why, the yearly records spoke of the exceeding drunkenness among the clergy of Virginia, and there is no such record attaching to any church, in any denomination, in any state, in any township of the United States to-day. General Washington's administration and his republic was rocked to its center by a whisky rebellion in a county in Pennsylvania, but in our time thirteen states and a million of men, and Americans at that, in arms against the republic for its overthrow, only placed it on firmer foundations with purer liberty. Pah! for your good old times. The best time is to-day, except to-morrow.

How to Help The Truth Seeker.

1. When renewing get a friend to subscribe and thus save a half dollar apiece.
2. Get your newsdealer to display it on his stand or in his shop window. Be sure that he displays the pictures.
3. Get your newsdealer to keep in stock one or more copies, with your guarantee to take off his hands at the end of the week any that remain unsold. If he exhibits them the pictures alone will sell them.
4. Take a few extra copies and circulate them among your acquaintances. On your request, we will send you back-number sample copies free.
5. Leave a copy occasionally where it will be picked up—in the train, in the factory, in the meeting-room, in the cigar store, in the barber-shop. Leave it picture-side up.
6. Keep in your pocket some of our cheap tracts, and when convenient hand one to a friend.
7. Get a new subscriber by persuading some friend to take it.

San Diego has done well in protesting against closing the World's Fair on Sunday. One of our readers there—we wish he had sent his name—has forwarded us a petition with six hundred and seventy-three signatures. We trust that all who hav petitions in hand will get them signed and forward them here this summer and fall, as the question may come up in the commission governing the Fair, though it is not expected to be settled till some time next year, and after a lengthy hearing accorded to the two parties. Confidentially, we may say to our readers that we expect the anti-Sabbatarians to win.

Why I Cannot Be a Christian.

He that hath brains to think let him think.

The Protestant Christian insists that I must read the Bible for myself, and that it is my duty to attend church. These things I did for forty years and more, until I became thoroughly emancipated from fear of the threatenings of prophet and priest. I am not a Christian because:

First. There is no such characteristic as mercy exhibited in the God of the Bible.

A threat is the first note from this God heard by the first man; the second note—one of banishment and death—soon follows.

A half dozen brief chapters record the severe disciplin of the struggling race, when, after a few generations had come and gone, this God, not satisfied with the ordinary means of human destruction, overwhelms in a flood every living creature save one miserable connecting link.

And there is no mercy in the rainbow promis; for this same God, whom Christians strive to worship, soon turns up in Egypt and brings upon his own creatures there calamities of the most cruel and shocking character. This Mosaic God is declared to hav ordered the sudden death at midnight of the first-born of every family in Egypt, causing every mother to mourn. It is recorded also that the first-born of all the cattle died in a like manner by his command, "that I may show my power unto Pharaoh." And the rainbow promis sinks to the bottom of the Red sea.

After the cruel display of "my power," favoritism becomes a ruling principle with this God; but even the "chosen remnant," who are favored with special promises, find little mercy, for that remnant is being smitten continually with this God's wrath. It goes hard with even the elect.

Wars, famins, pestilences, and direful threatenings run all through the Bible. Even the Psalms are filled with King David's praises to this God for his assistance against the surrounding factions and tribes; and thus he sings: "Thou hast enlarged my steps under me, that my feet do not slip. I hav pursued mine enemies, and overtaken them: neither did I turn again till they were consumed. For thou hast girded me with strength unto the battle: thou hast subdued under me those that rose up against me. Thou hast also given me the necks of mine enemies, that I might destroy them that hate me. They cried, but there was none to save them: even unto the Lord, but he answered them not." What a merciful Lord!

In Revelation we read that "they [those who are improperly marked] shall be tormented with fire and brimstone in the presence of the holy angels, and in the presence of the Lamb: and the smoke of their torments ascendeth up for ever and ever." What a merciful Lamb!

The Bible God creates man an imperfect being, and then inflicts eternal punishment upon him for being so. What a loving God!

But the God of Love and of Hell together—they cannot be thought:
If there be such a God, may the Great God curse him and bring him to nought (Tennyson).

I find, on reading the whole of the "sacred scriptturss," from the banishment of Adam and Eve on to the lake of fire and brimstone into which all those who do not know and worship this God shall be cast, that this particular God is a God of miracle, wrath, and cruelty.

An unmerciful people enthrone and worship an unmerciful God, and the worship of such a God tends to authorize and perpetuate cruelty. Hence Gods of this character and their prophets and priests hav furnished the excuse and rallying-cry for most of the wars between tribes and nations. The religious warrior expects help from a "God of battles," and styles him "Lord of hosts."

Certainly a large part of the history of the Jewish and Christian nations is a record of religious wars and sectarian persecutions. Some old scripture was called "The Wars of Jehovah." As in the Bible the "chosen people" were given "the heathen round about" to slay and rob, so Christians hav deemed it justifiable to use the sword and inquisitorial tortures to compel unwilling people to accept their God and support their priests. Force of some kind has been used whenever and wherever the church had the power. Most of Europe and America were converted by the sword. The banner of the cross has waved over thousands of battle fields, encouraging its followers in slaughter and robbery. The Mohammedan ultimatum, "Believe, pay tribute, or die," was in the Dark Ages narrowed by Christians to "Believe or die." Northmen prisoners taken in battle were beheaded for refusing to worship the cross. It cannot be pretended that the Crusades (called "holy wars") were anything else than religious wars. For two hundred years Europe was impoverished in the effort to get possession of the "holy sepulcher," but the Saracen God of battles proved fully equal to that of the Christian. The population and civilization of Mexico were almost blotted out under the crimson shadow of the bloody cross in the hands of Spanish Christians.

Along the centuries the Jew slew "the heathen round about," the Christian robbed and slew or banished the Jew, Unitarians were butchered by Trinitarians, Catholics murdered Protestants, Protestants robbed Catholics, an established church persecuted Dissenters, all hands in England oppressed the Puritans, and in turn the Puritans in Massachusetts burnt the Quakers.

Were all Christians of to-day freed from the religious superstitions taught them in childhood, not one could believe, in face of the record, that the Christian church and its cross has had any special divine guidance.

Second: The scriptures and gospels are not inspired.

Heretofore it has been held that every verse of the Bible is a divine utterance. Now it is declared by the best scholars, including many theologians, that this claim, in its entirety at least, cannot be sustained.

Much of the Pentateuch was written long after the death of Moses. Different parts were written at different times by different persons; hence repetitions and inconsistencies appear. In the first chapter of Genesis an account is made of the creation of Adam and Eve. In the second chapter another account, materially different, is given, making it plain enough that different legends of the creation were copied.

A considerable portion of the Pentateuch is devoted to the scheme of establishing Aaron and his seed as a "priesthood forever," to be entitled to tithes and fat offerings "throughout all generations." Some of the people at the time "murmured" at this family arrangement, and the wrath of the Lord is said to hav consumed many thousands of them. How merciful! Moses and Aaron constituted a king-and-priest government: a perpetual fat priesthood was established through "fear of the Lord."

The prophets of the Old Testament were too numerous, and too ready to charge one another with being false, to command any respect. On one occasion six hundred "false prophets" are slain by the prophet Elijah; and his successor in inspiration inspires two she-bears from the wood to tear in pieces forty-two children. That the prophets committed cruelties is likely enough; that they performed the preposterous miracles ascribed to them I do not believe.

In the Old Testament the awe-inspiring "Thus saith the Lord" is the pretended authority of prophet, priest, and robber. So young David, with his band of four hundred men who were "discontented and in debt," made a raid on farmer Nabal in sheep-shearing time, robbed him, seduced his wife, caused his death, and then "blessed the Lord that he smote Nabal." So old David himself was overcome by the conspirators (Bathsheba and the prophet Nathan), and, with the clincher "Thus saith the Lord," Solomon is proclaimed instead of Adonijah. And the first official act of the "wisest" man is to slay his brother.

After Moses, David becomes the central figure of the Old Testament. The "kingdom of David" is sought to be made an everlasting kingdom against all opposition. To oppose him is to oppose God, and certain it is that in the Psalms it is frequently impossible to distinguish one from the other. This "man after God's own heart" furnishes royal seed through Uriah's wife to keep the "everlasting kingdom" a-going.

Hence Collector Matthew begins his part of the work by showing that Jesus is connected through his father Joseph with the divinely-established kingdom of David, "that the scriptures might be fulfilled," and then straightway spoils his own story by declaring that Joseph wasn't there.

In respect to the New Testament, it is certain that we hav not a single word written by Jesus himself, and it is not certain that we hav any actual writings by any of the apostles.

The New Testament, like the Old, is the product of growth. Many different gospels were written; some anonymously. Some were accepted by Christian conclaves, others were rejected, while some were accepted which previously had been rejected. The Revelation, written about the beginning of the second century, was first rejected; not till early in the fourth century was it included in a canon. It denounced the churches in Asia, and the Asiatic Christians did not like it.

Previous to the fourth century there was no agreement among the churches regarding the writings and legends about Jesus. The Eastern churches were Unitarian, the Roman became Trinitarian. They quarreled to the death about this and other dogmas, and the Roman emperor (A.D. 325) finally used his authority in favor of the Trinitarians, and declared the Roman or Latin church, which supported that dogma, to be "catholic." This was the first application of the term catholic. The average Christian thinks he knows all about the persecutions of the early saints, but he knows nothing of the real character of the early churches.

It is a very important fact that the early Christian writers never speak of the apostolic writings as being inspired or as having any divine authority. To them "the scriptures" mean only the Old Testament. Now we are threatened with an eternal hell unless we believe such silly nonsense to be divinely inspired.

The authority of the scriptures and gospels is based mainly on dreams and visions. Many persons nowadays hav dreams and visions, which are generally laughed at, while a dream of some Arab three thousand years ago, or a vision of some lone fisherman two thousand years ago, is looked upon as a divine revelation.

The Christian system is a result of the commingling of different races and superstitions. The Jews believed in one God only, and the expected messiah was to be, not an invisible or human deity, but a counterpart of Moses, to again lead them out of the bondage of foreign oppression. But the early Christians, to conciliate and satisfy polytheistic Greeks and Romans who would not be satisfied with one God only, made a god of Jesus and another of the Holy Ghost—whatever that is. Hence the dogma of the "holy trinity," which was invented in the latter part of the third century. This dogma fixed the Jew, as well as all other outsiders; for now the Mosaic God alone won't do.

Third: Christian assumptions.

There are at the present time five great religious systems in the world, each one claiming to be the only true one. It is certain that all cannot be right, and it is just about as certain that they are all wrong. Each one furnishes its array of willing martyrs for its particular faith: hence martyrdom is not evidence worth considering.

It is claimed that Christianity is a divine religion because it possesses the best code of morals. This claim is both inconsistent and false. The orthodox Protestant and Catholic Christian alike declare that good moral conduct without just the right faith is worthless; and the claim is false because the best teachings in the Sermon on the Mount, including the Golden Rule, were compiled from the Persian and other Eastern codes; but the injunction that "to him who steals your coat giv your cloak also" is probably original. The Christian cannot fairly monopolize all the moral virtues. The claim is dishonest.

That the Christian system is not as bad as that of the Mohammedan cannot be taken as proof of a divine origin, else Buddhism must be accounted true because it is an improvement on Brahmanism.

Great stress is laid on the power to work miracles, as though the Christian had a monopoly of all that sort of thing. Why, all supernatural religions are founded on miracles and visions; and the more ignorant a people the stronger and more general is the faith in them. The Protestant Christian, however, is just sensible enough to deny the truth of any alleged miracles since the time of the apostles. But why should we not hav the benefit of more miracles? They were of frequent occurrence through the centuries from Moses to Paul. Now Christians themselvs hardly know what to believe, and a new miracle of some sort might help them on their way and lessen their sectarian differences; while nothing short of a genuin miracle will stop intelligent minds from denying the old stories of miracles altogether.

(TO BE CONCLUDED.)

It Makes a Difference.

God is represented as being of the masculin gender, and during the whole history of his "chosen people" (the people who chose him) he takes the heavy part of chief villain, supported by such leading male Hebrews as were smart enough to find their way to the front by the time-honored Jewish methods (questionable now to be sure but formerly rewarded by spoil). It may be that Moses in his first arrangement of the plan worked upon the basis that the main support of his religion would come through females, including the influences which they could bring to bear upon the tender minds of their offspring. "The hand that rocks the cradle rules the world." And Moses, the meek, long-headed schemer, was far-sighted enough to see that it would not be wise to hav a female god for the average "woman of the world" to worship. Males are inclined to worship females and vice versa, and it may be noticeable to all that, as a rule, human males do not take so kindly as females to worshiping the male god which Moses in his wisdom was meek enough to suggest.

In fact, there are but two classes of males who do any great amount of worshiping. First, those who worship for the bread and butter and meat there is in it; and second, those who are weak in the region where thought germs originate. On the contrary, females are inclined to worship, and especially those who are unmarried, mismated, or hav no male descendants. It seems to be the natural desire, inherited in woman, to worship man, and in his absence, or in the absence of a response, God, whom she supposes to be a male. Were God of the feminin gender there can be little doubt but that her worshipers would be principally males, and that there would be a corresponding jealousy in the female breast against her. If, on the other hand, God had been formed as neither male or female, perhaps there would not be so wide a difference in numbers of the sex of the worshipers; the controling influence being only the difference in the male and female nature; that of the female, being the more confiding and affectionate even where the object of affection be neither male or female in appearance, would hav a tendency to worship strength and power; while the male, being stronger, would worship beauty. As God is supposed to be the embodiment of strength and power, and could represent no beauty to a human mind without representing the human form, which would necessarily include one of the sexes, the female would undoubtedly still lead in the number of worshipers. Woman's nature to depend on a greater strength than her own would still lead her to any power or supposed power superior to herself, be it male or female or neither.

It will be noted that the church has always been opposed to the education of woman and still is opposed to her recovering the benefits of the electiv franchise, although there is no doubt but that the first effect of such a measure would be to greatly increase the power of the church.

The great controlers of the church who hav followed Moses and are now walking with their feet in his shoes, are farsighted enough, however, to know it would be the death-knell of the church. Woman would be raised very rapidly in point of intelligence and especially in self-dependence—that is, independence, or liberty. What woman would be controled by clergyman or priest who recognized in herself his equal or superior? Woman will never receive her right to vote from the church, and when she does receive it from those who are more liberal and broad of mind she will at the same time receive her liberty. The chains of superstition which now bind her will be broken and her pure mind will come forth from the dungeon of ignorant dependence into the sunlight of truth, and she will realize that man is her god, as she is his ever goddess. The Bitterness and Sweetness of Life and Death.

It is much to liv, but little to die. The Christian who denies himself the pleasures of life and suffers here below that he may enjoy and participate in the "life above," reminds one of the poor beggar who, wretched and starving, sat on the cold stone of a church door. Some kind-hearted person (an Infidel perhaps), whose heart was more full of kindness than his pocket-book was of money, gave him a small coin and passed on. And still the beggar sat there with the cold wind blowing the wet snow around the corner of that great empty church, and as his wasted hand clutched the coin he said to himself: "If I use this to-day I will hav nothing to-morrow and will surely starve, I am so hungry now." Well, he starved to-day, and when the to-morrow dawned the church sent one of her servants to carry him from her door. And after he had been prepared for a decent burial by some other than a Christian's hand, the church prayed over his frozen clay, she knelt beside his bier, and no doubt from his lifeless hand she wrenched that solitary dime and dropped it into her overflowing coffers. And in the potter's field, over the grave which she had had dug, the church wrote: "Blessed are the merciful, for they shall see God."

Yes, this beggar saved his money and starved to-day that he might eat to-morrow, but that to-morrow never came. How like a Christian's life. They hate (Luke 14–26), they fight, they suffer now that they may rejoice hereafter. Will that hereafter ever come?

Is it not a mere matter of choice, a mere answering of the question, Which shall it be? According to the Bible the Christian suffers to-day that he may enjoy to-morrow. The Infidel enjoys to-day and is doomed to suffering to-morrow. Each has his time of joy and of pain. Will that to-morrow ever come to either of them? If it does not, who will hav made the most of his talent, the Christian or the Infidel?

This striving for the best now, this longing for what is good, and pure, and true, which makes a heaven or hell on earth, this joy of the present with no fear of the future, raises one to a higher plane, calls forth all that is good and develops all that is noble. It doffs the blue eye-glasses through which the church is forever viewing the world and throws a new tint fresh from Nature's heart over our lives. It brushes the cobwebs from our misty brains, it givs love a nobler aim, a purer motiv, and a greater reward; it makes truth a greater honor, and honor a greater virtue.

To an Infidel the fear of death is unknown.

What has he who has lived an honest, honorable life, with no thought of a future heaven, no fear of future hell, to fear in death? It is the church who has robed Death in terror and wrested the balm from his hand and given him the sword. And it is the Christian who, having prepared a hell, must needs on his death-bed fear that by some accident he will make a misstep as he passes out into the darkness, and it is he and not the brave Infidel who fears death.

To an Infidel the sting of death is not in the thought of his own death-bed, but in the knowledge that this and that one of his loved ones must somehow somewhere step out into that dreamless sleep, pass from his sight into that eternal silence.

And yet when he bends above that beloved face for the last time there is not that fear of the heaven that this one may hav missed, nor the terror that the thought of an eternity in hell would bring.

Let each die as he has lived, and like a weary worker who sighs for rest, or a suffering invalid who wooes sleep, let us put our hand steadily in the hand of death and "approach our grave as one who wraps the draperies of his couch about him and lies down to pleasant dreams." EDNA HEALD.

The Beauties of Theism.

God has not wound up nature like a clock, and then hung up the key, letting the machine run without his supervision. His withdrawal would be the retraction of gravitation and cohesion, so that the machine would not only stand still but crumble into dust so fine as to baffle Tyndall to find either potency or prophecy. By the word were all things made, and by the word of his power are all things upheld (John i, 3; Heb. 1, 3). He is "the fountain of life," and without him no lichen can grow, no insect breathe, and no soul think, feel, or act. If any atom can exist without the divine upholding, then can also a world; and if a world, so can the universe. Take the divine superintendency out of the smallest particle of matter, and the principle is admitted which demonstrates his non-existence.—Dr. C. H. Balsbaugh in Wilford Hall's Microcosm, about 1882.

According to this, God is in everything, moves everything that moves, causes everything that is caused, does everything that is done. No wasp or bee ever stung a man without the help of God; no rattlesnake ever struck his fangs into the quivering flesh of a darling child without thereby imparting some of the grace of God; and it requires a special afflatus of the Holy Spirit (if not an overshadowing) to enable a cannibal to masticate the savory morsels of his missionary steak.

If God moves every atom, it is he who nerves the arm of John Sullivan to strike those fatal blows during his pugilistic combats; and it is he who causes the blood to flow, the lips to swell, and the features to unshape themselvs under the manipulations of the arm and fist of the pugilist.

If the Rev. Dr. Balsbaugh's view is correct, then during a battle, if God should withdraw his personal supervision, not an atom of powder would explode when the hammer fell on the cartridge; not a single bullet could move out of a gun even if the powder did explode (because every atom moves at the command of God); and even if the bullet should happen to go on its way, and pass through a man's body, it would not make any hole therein, nor cause any damage, for it requires the personal supervision and divine superintendency to cause the particles of the human body to giv way and make room for the passage of the bullet, otherwise atoms would be moving in obedience to a material force and God's non-existence would at once be demonstrated.

When a farmer sends his boy to plow a piece of stump-land and the plow, in shaking up a rotten stump, eliminates a quantity of yellow-jackets which alight on boy and horses, stinging the one nearly to death and causing the others to swing the plow about their heels to their destruction or maiming for life, what a comfort it is to the farmer to reflect that his holy God, his loving heavenly father, is the cause of the whole catastrophe; that not a single motion could hav been made, not a sting inflicted, not a cut or bruise made, without the "divine superintendency" of his loving father.

When an industrious and frugal widow is compelled to send her only daughter to the pasture to drive up the milch cows, and the maid steps upon a viper or rattlesnake from the bite of which she dies, how it must enlarge the benevolence, mollify the caustic grief, and soothe the perturbed emotions of the mother, in turning her tearful gaze to heaven to receive, as by inspiration, the consoling remembrance that "I, God, did it, who doeth all things well." "Is there evil in the land, and the Lord hath not done it?" "Beloved, I create evil." Yea, verily; for the poisonous fangs of the serpent could hav made no impression on the tender flesh of the idol of the poor widow's heart without the displacement of "the smallest particles of matter," which requires "the divine superintendency." Deny this and "the principle is admitted which demonstrates his non-existence." Even the blood would not move the first step toward assimilating the poison unless the holy spirit of God should tell or somehow inspire it to do so.

When a criminal is brought to the gallows on account of the commission of some heinous crime or dastardly outrage, what a help it must be to his faith, what an encouragement to his hope of pardon, to know that the holy spirit stood by him in the hour of his temptation, caused his blood to boil with lust or malice, and gave him strength to perform the deed. No wonder he expects mercy! It would be a poor God that could not justify and even sanctify his own acts.

How busy God must be in moving all those little atoms called chiggers and helping them to bite. I hav seen children in Kansas who play in the grass and climb cherry-trees nearly covered with red swellings caused by these minute and almost invisible mites created by God "for the greater manifestation of his glory." What a poor, disconsolate, unsuitable "probationary state" this would be without chiggers, fleas, bed-bugs, lice, needle-worms in well water, chinch-bugs and army-worms in the wheat, miasmatic swamps, poison in air and water, potato-bugs, weeds, snakes, cut-worms, cockle-burrs, hornets, priests, office-seekers, monopolists, millionaires, and other divine blessings, for which, as Mr. Heston says, we should be piously grateful and "thank God it is no worse."

The most wonderful thing about this wonderful Theism, as expounded by Dr. Balsbaugh and many other modern divines, is that it runs so quickly into Universalism and fatalism, either of which conclusion would soon render the priesthood a superfluity. In its zeal to prove a God it leaves no room for a devil and nothing for him to do; for, if a devil can move an atom "without the divine superintendency," then a God becomes unnecessary to the work of moving atoms. If a devil could move atoms, other living creatures could do so; and these other living creatures, being material, would show by every action that matter could move itself. So, it seems best on the whole that the tacticians who get their livings by feeding credulity with superstition should "claim everything in sight," for their God, as politicians do for their candidates, lest "the principle should be admitted which demonstrates his non-existence."

A Zoological Superstition.

It is possible that by reading "Some Problems of Nature" in THE TRUTH SEEKER of July 4th, some may be led to believe in the ridiculous theory of the origin of the so-called hair-snake (Gordius Aquaticus) which the writer upholds, and which is surely on a par with the theory that earth-worms rain down because they suddenly appear during a shower. I hav repeatedly offered $5 to anyone who would catch a "fish-worm" in their hat as it descended from the skies, but no one claims the money. Likewise I hav offered the same for each hair turned into a worm, and although repeated efforts hav been made by different persons, the hairs refuse to wiggle. Investigators hav scientifically shown that "hair-worms" lay eggs, and their offspring develops in ponds, and that often, when very small, they attach themselvs to the abdomen of a grasshopper or other insect, and burrow into it, which finally causes death to the insect. Afterward the worm emerges much larger and seeks a stagnant pool, or damp earth, or leaves, in which it livs and lays eggs. People should not jump to the erroneous conclusion that they come from hairs simply because they resemble them. These curious little creatures can be dried in the sun until they are stiff, but after being kept in that condition for days at a time, will be as lively as ever on being put in water again. A full-grown one will feel like rubber, and is larger around than a hair, but not very long. I never saw one over twelve inches in length, although hair can be obtained from the tail of a cow or a horse much longer than that. They hav a habit of several twisting themselvs together in a kind of ball, which seems almost impossible to untangle—recalling to mind the famous Gordian knot,—hence their name, Gordius. Persons wishing to read more about them, should send fifteen cents to the Truth Seeker Company for No. 29 of the Humboldt Library, or they can look for Gordius in any good encyclopedia. F. S. Enoch's Denominational Leaning.

One of Chauncey Depew's Chestnuts at the Independent's Fourth of July Celebration.

I like to brag on the Fourth of July. I was invited by a clerical classmate of mine—most of my classmates became ministers [laughter], and I am glad of it because they say they keep praying for me, and I keep preying on my fellow-men [laughter], and we are both satisfied—he said: "Come around to my church. I hav a young minister from New Haven who is going to try himself this morning." So I went around. The young clergyman was tremulous and fearful, and he took for his text, "Enoch was not." He said that Enoch was not an Episcopalian, because he did not go to theaters or dance. [Laughter.] Enoch was not a Methodist, because he never fell from grace. Enoch was not a Presbyterian, because he believed that there were other men as good as he. Enoch was not a Baptist, because he did not think that the quantity of water made any difference. But Enoch was a Congregationalist, because he walked with God.

The Folly of the Bible-Savers.

No sensible man can regret the theological quarrels now dividing several of the sects, nor can he fail to be amused at the absurdities they disclose. It is difficult to say which side makes itself the most ridiculous. Over these fights among the Episcopalians, the Presbyterians, and the Baptists, not only is the pulpit and the religious press deeply agitated, but the secular papers take a hand in them, as though a great national convulsion is disturbing us, with ruin threatening in the distance. Convulsion and ruin (to something) there may well be; but what is it all about?

The pettiness of the disputes, and the frivolousness of the issues raised, can only excite merriment at the flame already kindled. Why does Heber Newton appeal from the Thirty-nine Articles to the Nicene creed? Does he expect to find more theological sense and wisdom in the fifth century than in the sixteenth? We do not know. But he is menaced with ecclesiastical decapitation. What does either of these creeds amount to? Both of them are made up of theological phrases coined and put together when the human reason was in eclipse, when bigotry and superstition united to manufacture dogmas as pueril as they are offensiv to common sense. And will it save Heber Newton to prefer the verbal gymnastics of the Catholic fathers to those of the Protestant rebuilders? See what a Protestant inquisition will do with him.

And what is Dr. Briggs about? Attempting to expurgate the Bible, cleanse it of its indecencies and falsehoods, that it may be more acceptable to the human temper of to-day.

And if Dr. Bridgman could eliminate hell from theology, he doubtless thinks that he and the human race would be happier.

These three clergymen may hav the credit, in this war of creeds, of perceiving that organized religion has planted itself on corruptions and indecencies that are abhorrent to human nature, and of attempting to purge it of its more offensiv features. But they undertake the impossible task of endeavoring to cleanse the Bible, and save it, too. The Bible, as it stands in theology, is a structure so built and supported that in taking out even one of its props the whole concern totters and falls. That is, it falls to a human level. An ordinary book may contain both wisdom and folly; but he who cares to read it may accept the one and discard the other. It is not so with the Bible. Its power over the minds of the ignorant, the credulous, and the superstitious, as well as its great use to the church, consist in the dogma that it is "divinely inspired;" and when, in the name of the church, you admit that it contains falsehoods and indecencies, you destroy its power altogether. If it cannot stand on plenary inspiration, it cannot stand as a holy book at all.

Now, how can Heber Newton call Genesis a parable, and Dr. Bridgman deny that the Bible teaches hell, and Dr. Briggs point out any of its errors and falsehoods, without being compelled by fair logic to renounce its inspiration altogether? If these gentlemen will not do this their position becomes absurd. As a human book, you may save what is good in the Bible, and reject what is false and pernicious; but to say that certain things in that volume are against fact and reason, and then to claim that you must cling to the whole of it as "holy," is to make yourself ridiculous.

The truth is, these "Liberal" clergymen are attacking religion in its most vulnerable point. Take inspiration from the Bible, and hell from religion, and what would become of the church? The church is built upon supernaturalism. Deprive it of this, leave nothing to generate and feed superstition, and the whole thing crumbles, and priestcraft finds "its occupation gone." The little sects who hav been striving to liv on the smallest modicum of supernaturalism hav always been "living at a poor dying rate."

It is doubtless the fact that the majorities now bent on suppressing and silencing these free-thinking clergymen are honestly struggling to save the church. But inconsistent as they are, these latter are without question doing good service to humanity in aiding to expose the frauds that hav enslaved the human understanding already too long.

The Investigation of Spiritualism.

The American Psychical Society, by its secretary, has sent us its prospectus and constitution with "a cordial invitation to the readers of your paper to become members of our society." The full membership fee is five dollars. The society needs money.

The purpose of this society—so the prospectus states—is to investigate the phenomena of modern Spiritualism in accordance with the scientific method, with a view to determining the facts and laws, and the most probable hypothesis which will explain the facts and laws. It is believed by the organizers of the society that many species of phenomena, such as slate-writing and table-tipping, are to such a large extent so strictly physical in character, reducible to motions in time and space, as to bring them clearly within the most conservativ lines of scientific observation. The attempt will be made to begin with the simpler phenomena, reserving the more complex species for later treatment. The society hopes that the value of their work can be increased by following in the footsteps of Prof. Robert Hare and others, by using apparatus. It seems probable, they say, that in some cases the "personal equation" of the medium can be entirely eliminated, reducing him, perhaps, as truly to the rank of a piece of apparatus as are the chemical balance and the galvanometer in the hands of the experimenter in physical science. The great emphasis is to be laid upon actual experiments with mediums; every other line of work will be subordinated to this. Activ members are charged five dollars per year; associate members, without vote, three dollars. Membership is obtained by vote of the directors, who elect officers, control the affairs and funds of the society, select the people to attend séances, and do all other business of and for the society.

In closing their appeal to the public the writers of the prospectus say: "No problem of greater importance to humanity confronts the world to-day than the one our society will attempt to solve. If all spiritualistic phenomena be delusions, it is a sad spectacle to behold thousands, if not millions of people in Europe and America so completely led astray. If, upon the other hand, careful research be destined to yield a residuum of facts which cannot be explained by the delusion hypothesis, we are profoundly impressed that the world needs a knowledge of them and of the explanations which will surely be proposed in due time by the students of psychical science."

Such, in brief, are the reasons for and outline of the work the society proposes to attempt. That it will fail in establishing anything is as sure as that all other investigating societies hav failed to convince the general public pro or con in the matter. Exposures of mediums by societies or individuals hav no effect whatever upon the great body of Spiritualists; they but cling closer to their faith. They will explain a particular exposure by saying a particular medium was dishonest, and that counterfeit only proves that there is genuin coin. On the other hand, all the seemingly miraculous occurrences testified to by thousands of honest Spiritualists hav equally little effect upon those who rely on known natural laws and human experience as premises for their reasoning. A dead man, they say, was never known to come to life, while men hav been known to be deceived, and even to lie, and to them the latter is by far the most probable hypothesis.

But, aside from this consideration, there are others which necessarily make the work of the new society of no value. We hope our friends the ministers will forgiv us for what we are about to say, but we seek the truth and it must come out. The society at present is composed of twenty-eight persons, who, naturally enough, propose to run the thing. Nineteen of these are ministers. The president and secretary are both ministers. Five of the directors are ministers. Personally, for some of these ministers—those whose fame has reached beyond their parishes, like the Rev. Mr. Savage—we hav considerable respect, and probably the others are as worthy of it as he, as being good, sincere men. They are chiefly Unitarians, and we are willing to believe so. But the fact nevertheless remains that ministers are unfitted by training and habits and beliefs to do anything scientifically which touches the domain of religion. The fact that they believe Christianity proves this. They are prepared already to admit the existence of a world of spirits; most of them believe in miracles; they believe in a great big overruling Spirit, or Man, of whose existence they hav not the slightest shadow of proof; they think there is a heaven of which no human being knows anything. If, then, they accept, without investigation or proof, such stupendous assertions as truth, of what value can their testimony be in a matter involving just these things. Belief in "ancient Spiritualism"—in ghosts and gods and sons of gods—men at once human and divine—fatherless sons of virgin mothers—resurrections and ascensions—devils and evil spirits, and all the other paraphernalia of superstition embodied in Christianity—makes belief in "modern Spiritualism" extremely easy. And to go a little farther, but still well within the bounds of solid truth, anyone who accepts the Christian tale as historical on the evidence which its apologists present is not of that judicial mind the possession of which alone can make judgments weighty. With such men, science and evidence hav little influence; sentiment and ideas obtained in receptiv youth a great deal. We are not saying this with any desire to disparage the particular ministers on the society's list. They are an exceptionally fine body of churchmen, but it is time they comprehended their own position, and set about investigating their own fitness to pose as scientific teachers.

Another phase of the inquiry operating to make it of no utility is the attitude of the mediums. Other investigating committees and societies hav had no difficulty in obtaining the services of mediums, but the mediums hav had their own "conditions" whenever phenomena hav been produced. The Seybert Commission spent much money in this way and obtained many theories of how the phenomena were produced. But does any Spiritualist believe that it was all human work? On the other hand, if the mediums are not allowed their "conditions" they will not sit. That is, in the plain words of the worldly, "if they can't beat the game they won't sit in." We hav had a little experience in this matter, obtained when seeking Spiritual facts in the most impartial spirit—willing to be shown proofs of disembodied intelligence, willing even to sit when the mediums had their "conditions," and only *un*willing to be made a fool of for the glory of Spiritualism—and feel confident that all "investigation" will be as fruitless in the future as it has been in the past. People must be individually convinced in a matter of this kind, each for himself, and whether Spiritualism be deception or fact, or partly both, a society is not going to solve the question for the world. There is no question that mediums will produce "phenomena" if given their "conditions." It is their business. They make a living by doing it. But it is also unquestionable that mediums will not allow "test conditions" which destroy their powers of manipulation and disrange their program. They hav allowed them, or will allow them some other time, or other people hav obtained results when so allowed—but they will not do it right then and there. The priests of this faith, as we hav said before, are no more willing to help investigate the subject than are the priests of another faith to investigate their religion. Inquirers of the most gentle type are pushed away, and experiment is not desired by those who hav the mysteries of the faith in their keeping. "The doctrin of the soul and its mortality or immortality, which appears in the history of philosophy like the shades of departed Scandinavian heroes, eternally slaying one another and eternally coming to life again in a metaphysical Nifelheim," will not be settled through any aid the mediums will extend, nor through any investigation conducted by those who, in starting, accept miraculous legends without having investigated their probability. What is needed in this instance is fair-minded Agnostic investigators and coöperating mediums. But when one of these is at hand the other is not found. So the see-saw continues, neither side convinced nor confuted, and so it will probably be after the American Psychical Society has added all it can to the knowledge of the world.

What the Spiritualists Themselvs Want.

That we hav not misjudged the mediums and their supporters in the preceding comments upon the ministerial investigators is evident from the editorial indorsement by the Banner of Light of the Harbinger of Light's criticism of the project. The two journals of light represent probably the opinion of eight-tenths of the Spiritualists. These representativ journals consider phenomenal Spiritualism to hav advanced beyond the stage when it may be considered a theory and to hav passed to the realm of actuality. Fifteen or twenty years ago, they say, the propositions of the American Psychical Society would hav seemed reasonable, "but it is rather too late in the day to ask the questions, 'Is the movement founded on delusion?' and 'Is it not time for a few truth-loving persons, approaching the subject in a serious frame of mind, to investigate it, guided by a purely scientific method?' 'Is it not in the best interests of humanity that this matter shou'd be settled once for all?' Were it not for the names attached to this prospectus we should look upon the matter as a joke, or presume that the initiators of the movement were woefully ignorant of the history of modern Spiritualism."

As for scientific "experiments," these journals consider that enough in that line has already been done. The published experiments of Professors Hare, Crookes, and Zöllner, and the report of the London Dialectical Society, they maintain, are sufficient demonstration of the reality of the phenomena; and they assert that "their correctness has never been seriously questioned; but they are supplemented and indorsed by the experiments and testimony of thousands of clear-headed investigators in the ranks of society and in all parts of the world."

That the mediums and Spiritualists will afford Mr. Savage's society little aid is pretty plainly hinted in this sentence: "How can they expect to investigate the phenomena without mediums, who are the instruments through which it is elicited, and how can they reasonably expect to obtain the coöperation of good mediums to run a 'murderous gauntlet' under their strictly scientific method of investigation?" The criticism is further made that investigators into Spiritualism never follow a "strictly scientific method," invariably seeking "to solve Spiritual things by material methods or physical science," and not only failing to study psychic science but completely ignoring its existence. Had the gentlemen and ladies composing the American Psychical Society, the two journals of light add, "announced themselvs as a body associated together for the purpose of making a philosophical examination of the phenomena called Spiritual, and asked the coöperation of men of experience in the field they were about entering, their prospects of success would hav been much brighter."

Naturally enough the investigators of Spiritualism will retort at once that Spiritualists are anxious to confine "investigation" to considering the theory of the faith, for "psychic science" is no science at all, and a "philosophical examination of the phenomena called Spiritual" means endless talk with each party concluding just where it begun. Such an "examination" is of course worthless; but it is the only consideration of the subject the people that we may call orthodox believers desire.

Having condemned the methods of science the two journals of light naïvely add:

"The truly scientific man is modest; he is only positiv about those things which he has demonstrated by careful experiment to be true, and he does not expect the world at large to accept even these on his dictum.

"The testimony already accumulated as to the phenomenal facts is too solid to be shaken by any report of the Psychic or any other association. Ocular demonstration is not difficult to obtain by those who will devote a reasonable time to seek and observe it; whilst the ethics built upon the facts are often sufficient to convince intellectual people without personal investigation of the phenomenal basis.

"Spiritualism is not in its swaddling clothes; it is on its feet and capable of taking care of itself; it is in the light and courts examination. Anyone who desires can investigate it to their heart's content, but they must go to it—it will not come at the beck and call of any self-constituted body, to submit itself to any method of examination or torture they may desire.

"A truly scientific examination, whether by an individual or an association, cannot fail to be productiv of good results; but neither individuals nor associations can claim to be truly scientific who do not yield to the conditions which experience has shown to be essential for the evolution of the phenomena they seek to examin."

In view of the previous statements this inclines one to smile; it substantiates completely the opinion we before expressed—that Spiritualism givs no aid to investigators unless the "conditions" are fully observed. As all "conditions" of phenomenal Spiritualism are such that fraud is easily perpetrated; as inquiries are met with long and meaningless sentences; as scientific methods are petulantly refused, there is no hope of solving the question of a future intelligent existence from physical experiments with mediums. And the assertion that "only scientific" investigation is that in which the producers of phenomena are allowed unquestioned their own "conditions" shows how hopeless it is to reason with them. It must be that they do not comprehend the first principles of science, or are ignorant of the meaning of words, or willfully muddle the whole subject.

The two journals of light agree with us as to the value of the American Psychical Society's labor—that "very little result can be expected from it." They ground their opinion upon the idea that the "scientists" will not allow the "conditions;" we upon the notion that the investigators are not scientific men—inasmuch as they already believe in unprovable things—and that no medium will produce for them any phenomena under circumstances admitting of no possible thaumaturgical practices.

The Surest Way to Heaven.

Four murderers were legally killed in this state on the 7th instant. All but one, a Japanese, went to heaven direct. The Jap, being a heathen, is now in hell. All were brutal men, who deserved to be secluded from the rest of the world for the remainder of their lives. They were unfit to be at large, as is a tiger, and could hav earned their board by producing useful articles.

The following extract from a daily paper shows how easy it is to get to heaven, or at least to convince a murderer that he is going there: "The condemned men spent their last hours of waking in prayer with their spiritual advisers, the Rev. Fathers Creeden, Lynch, and Hogan, the Rev. Mr. Edgarton, and the Rev. Mr. Law, chaplain of the Tombs. They knew at 6 o'clock Monday night that they would die at sunrise the next morning. The news was broken to them by the ministers. It did not seem to surprise them. When the news was broken to Slocum, he seemed not to hear it; he began at once to talk about something else. Father Hogan was with him. 'Father,' he said, 'are you sure that such a wicked man as I will be saved?' 'Sure of it,' said the priest. 'Why, there is no doubt of it.' And then he told a story of two women. One led a pure life and gave to charity liberally. She was a hypocrit in some things. She died without repentance, and was lost. The other was a harlot. Oh, she was one of the worst women that ever lived. She cared not the snap of her finger for religion. She cared for nothing that was good. She was simply wicked. She was taken sick, and on her deathbed she came to a realizing sense of her sins. She repented and was saved. This seemed to comfort Slocum very much, and his face brightened up, but his spirits wavered. 'It is not that I fear death,' he said; 'so miserable a fellow as I is better dead than alive, and I hav the courage to face death, but it is the courage to face heaven that I lack.'

"Slocum was not wrong when he said he had the courage to face death. As the time approached he became more and more wrapped up in the contemplation of the heavenly future, and when summoned by the keepers to pass under the fatal doorway his hands were clasped and his face wore a wrapt and exalted expression. He obeyed the directions of those in the execution room and spoke intelligently, but his thoughts seemed far away. He died with scarcely a struggle.

"Wood was of a different make. His nature was more even, not so subject to fluctuations as Slocum's. When he accepted religion he became a serious man. Religion became almost his only thought. It was natural, therefore, that his last hours should be different from Slocum's. There was no such exaltation in his case. Similarly there were no such moments of depression. Wood never doubted when once he became a Christian. As the time approached he talked calmly with the priest. Their talk was of heaven. As the priest painted his joys, Wood gradually grew into a higher state of faith and expectation, and it was with joy most evident that he walked into the death chamber and seated himself in the chair which was to be the means of his attainment of his highest happiness."

If anything could be wanting to disgust people with the Christian scheme of "salvation" the priest's talk and the "conversion" of the brutal murderers would surely furnish it.

Editorial Notes.

The danger in riding a hobby too hard is apparent in the following conclusion arrived at by Mrs. Slenker. Writing to Lucifer on the interesting subject of "virgin generation" that estimable lady says: "If there be a higher and better life yet to come, that race will no doubt be mainly of the feminin sex. Gods themselvs, did such beings exist, would all be females." The first assertion is splendid news for the few favored male immortals, but Lord bless us! what will the unprovided-for lady angels do? A heavenful of Jackless Gills is not the place most girls are looking forward to. Better the Christian heaven where there is no marriage nor giving in marriage, and so of course the boy and girl angels take it out in courting. But how does Mrs. Slenker know that if there were things with the attributes given to gods they would be females?

It is a great thing for the church to hav a pious man in a family which owns a great railroad, but it is rather hard upon the poor passengers who are presented by the peddlers of piety with such slush as this: "The Rev. Mr. Rogers, of Dedham, expostulating with those of his hearers who neglected the sacred scriptures, as if God himself were speaking said, 'I hav long intrusted you with my holy Bible, but you hav slighted it. It lies in your houses covered with dust and cobwebs. You care not to look into it. Do you use my Bible so? You shall hav it no longer.' He then lifted the sacred volume and turning round, appeared as if he were carrying it away. Then suddenly turning back again, and personating the people, he fell on his knees, and wept and pleaded thus with God: 'O Lord, whatever thou dost to us take not thy Bible from us! take our children—burn our houses—destroy our goods—only spare us thy Bible!' Then he again addressed the people as from their maker: 'Say you so? Well, I will try you yet a little longer; here is my Bible for you. I will yet a little further see in what manner you will treat it; whether henceforth you will love it and study it as it requires.' A general weeping ensued; and it is hoped that from that hour many studied and obeyed the long neglected Bible." A few years ago Mr. Vanderbilt ordered all of Colonel Ingersoll's works to be taken from the newsstands of the depots of his railroads, and this is his substitute. The exchange is not complimentary to the people's intelligence.

Reference was made last week to two new views of Thomas Paine, one by a Unitarian and the other by a Methodist organ, in which that much maligned Infidel was spoken of with respect and favorably compared with some of the Christian critics of to-day. Now we hav another and similar notice—intended to be complimentary—in an extract from Moncure D. Conway's forthcoming Life of Paine. Mr. Conway says: "To-day it is difficult for us to realize the attitude of those who criticised the 'Age of Reason' thirty years ago. Paine was pictured as a monster, generally, of course, by people who had not read his writings at all, and the epithets heaped upon him were as fantastic as any applied to the most hardened heretic that ever lived. As a matter of fact, Paine was not only a Deist, he not only believed in God, but was a reverent believer. In fact, the attitude of Paine—the scourged and vilified Tom Paine—toward the Bible and the general beliefs of the Christian church differed in scarcely any material respect from the attitude of the advanced Unitarian church to-day. Paine anticipated a great many of the changes which hav taken place in all the Christian churches, and he did so without ever taking the position ignorantly ascribed to him by those who hav no actual knowledge of what he has written." But it is not difficult at all to one who thinks. The people who criticised Paine thirty years ago were real Christians. To-day Christianity has been *out*grown by the decent people and the scholars of the world, and they hav grown up to Paine. Mr. Conway is not a Christian. The real Christians, like the Roman Catholics and the fellows who are after Professor Briggs, vilify Paine as much as ever, and just as ignorantly.

Letters from Friends.

That Refusal to Consider.

WILBER, NEB., June 20, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I want to say that I believe you hav got Holyone Johnsmaker in a hole. Keep your trumpet aimed well at the head of the post-office department, and keep up a weekly bombardment through THE TRUTH SEEKER by calling public attention to his refusal to consider one complaint as carefully as another, and it will do more good than all the petitions for pardon of innocent and honest Freethinkers for alleged violation of postal laws. H. KILGORE.

A Spreader of the Truth.

THREE RIVERS, MICH., June 16, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I was happily surprised to find, so early and promptly, the short essay that I sent for your consideration entitled, "Why Does Not the Bible God Destroy the Bible Devil?" inserted in your last issue of the grand TRUTH SEEKER paper. Of course I felt highly honored and pleased, for I suppose myself to be somewhat like the old owl that "declared her baby owls to be the handsomest birds in the woods."

I am going to follow out your advice to place the back numbers of the pictorial papers where they will be seen and read by such parties as I think will be interested, and as, I hope, will see fit to become subscribers to your paper, or if not, who may order some of your Freethought books and pamphlets.

If you can send me three or four copies of the June 16th number, in which my essay is published, I would gladly pass them to some Freethought and Liberal progressiv men in this place. Yours fraternally, E. D. BLAKEMAN.

Crazy Christians Ready to Burn.

NORTH BENTON, O., June 18, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Within find $3. $1 you may apply to the picture book. As soon as ready send me one. The balance, $2, apply on THE TRUTH SEEKER. I cannot liv without the paper. And the pictures are the most valuable weapons I can offer to show the ridiculousness of the divinity of what the Christians call the holy Bible—to show the blind superstition of the pretended followers of the holy book. Two prominent citizens and members of a church, neighbors of mine, publicly and privately claim they talk daily face to face with God, and they claim God directs their daily words and acts. Now, these people are mature in years, not far from sixty years old, and hav been raised in what we call a civilized community, and in courts of justice their oath would be taken as soon as an average citizen's, and they are willing to make oath that they talk to God face to face and God directs their every-day actions. I proposed listening to them one whole day and giving them one thousand dollars if they could demonstrate the fact that they talked to God and God heard them and answered their talk. They said they could not demonstrate it to me, but they knew it themselvs as well as they knew anything. On all other subjects I would believe them sooner than I would an average citizen, but that they think they talk to God and God talks to them is more than I can believe. For my part, I cannot be dishonest to myself, whatever I might be to my fellow-men. I might hav a motiv for that; but I can see no motiv for being dishonest to myself, and how an intelligent man can work himself to a point to believe such spookery is more than I can divine. In my judgment, if a man can work his mind up to that point he can work it up to the point to believe it is right and just to burn and torture those that cannot work their mind up to that point. But the world is getting wiser, and these things will pass away.

CHESTER BEDELL.

A Rejected Communication.

443 SIXTY-FOURTH STREET, ENGLEWOOD, CHICAGO, ILL., June 19, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: The inclosed communication was offered to the Tribune of this city for publication, and refused, the managing editor giving as a reason that the language was too strong. I asked him if it was not the truth. He replied that it might be the truth, but that the Tribune did not wish to start a controversy. The truth is that the press of this country is being subsidized by the church. These papers will not hesitate to publish the sermons which denounce and lie about those who will not subscribe and swallow their nonsense.

I cannot do without THE TRUTH SEEKER. S. ROBERTS.

ENGLEWOOD, CHICAGO, ILL., June 19, 1891.

Editor of the Tribune: In to-day's issue you report that among the sweeping resolutions adopted by the Baptis Association's session at Englewood was one "directed against the opening of the World's Fair Sunday." It ended by wishing that the "air would be filled with electricity that would smite and confound the enemies of God."

The inhuman and murderous spirit expressed in the resolution is worthy only of the times in the Dark Ages when the church had supreme control of the minds and actions of the people. Think of a body of men representing Christ, who commanded them to love their enemies, pray for them, and if struck on the right cheek to turn the other also, etc., etc., being guilty of such inconsistency.

Were it not for the law of the land, enacted under the benign influence which the inestimable blessing of science has brought in the world, these men, like the Inquisitors of old, would kill those whom they could not convert. According to the interpretation which Jesus givs of the man who, in his heart, lusts after a woman, these pious gentlemen hav already committed murder in their hearts. How lucky it is for the Liberal thinker, the Agnostic, and the like, that the God which these hypocrits appeal to cannot answer their bigoted and cowardly prayers.

But what does Science do for mankind? "Science does not persecute. It does not shed blood. It fills the world with light. It cares not for heresy; it develops the mind, and enables man to answer his own prayers" (Ingersoll).

SAMUEL ROBERTS.

Communion Making Drunkards.

HORNITOS, CAL., June 18, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I am glad to know that a subject which has interested me for many years has come up for discussion, and that there are those not afraid to speak openly of such inconsistency as using wine at communion. It is used without being an emblem of spiritual affairs when used in its material self and not as Christ used it. He turned water into wine (material into spiritual) in his life, and his last supper with his disciples was a pledge that they should think of and follow his teachings spiritually. My father was a physician, and I know of many instances of church-members coming to him after communion season asking him for an antidote, or some help, to do away with the cruel and excessiv appetite which would take possession of them after the wine had passed to their lips and its enticing odor been inhaled. One instance which my mind often reverts to, is of a deacon whose duty it was to pass around the "emblem" so called. He had when a young man been led into temptation and had become a lover of the wine-cup, but repented and joined the church as a safeguard. I hav often heard him declare it was cruel to tempt the appetite to return to what seemed the world's curse, while the church was uppermost in decrying its use as a sin. Then why use it as the very opposit idea? There was a noble boy, and only son of one of the deacons, who in the same church was tempted and fell through the communion-cup, it being his first temptation to love the taste of wine. The habit caused his destruction morally, and his death. Almost his last words were: "Why, oh, why must wine be used in churches, when it is only 'fit for the bar-room,' as the good say? I never would hav gone there after it. It took me unawares under the disguise of good. The time will yet come when this inconsistency will be corrected. But not by the church element; it is too slow." I remember how the church people and minister spoke of his heretical idea for years after, but I comprehended his true meaning. And the use of wine at communion (and its dreadful reputation when taken elsewhere) by the ministers and very good people, makes the act more farcical than solemn to my mind. J. E. C.

Sortie On the Enemy's Works.

NEWARK VALLEY, July 3, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Being confined to the house since February with a broken hip and having quite a bit of leisure, I thought I could not devote a small portion of my time to better advantage than to tell THE TRUTH SEEKER readers of an incident of my experience in a religious revival which happened quite recently. If not instructiv, it may be amusing. This revival took place in the winter season, as all revivals do. To digress a little, this has always been a puzzle to me, until quite recently—why God does not save souls in the summer as well as in the winter? But quite recently, I think I hav discovered the cause. God seems to work back and forward in the temperate zones. We never hear of any religious revivals in the torrid or frigid zones. He seems to work in the north temperate zone in winter during the long winter evenings when people hav time to attend to such trifling matters; then, when the warm season comes on in the north temperate and the cold winters come on in the south temperate, he employs his time there, and "vice-versy." This lucid explanation may set many inquiring minds at rest.

This bit of religious history happened in this wise. I was going cross-lots to one of my neighbors, while the cold west wind was blowing fearfully in my face, to borrow a broad-ax, about 2 o'clock in the afternoon. Just before getting to the house, a presentiment struck me—"What if I should run into one of those Methodist prayer-meetings" which were being held at the houses in the afternoon preparing the people for the more important evening meetings held at the church? Sure enough! When I knocked at the door of Mr. M., the minister, Rev. Mr. J., opened the door, saying, "Mr. Councilman? We are glad to see you to a Methodist prayer-meeting. Come in." I said "I had not come to the prayer-meeting. I had come to borrow a broad-ax." Mr. M., the neighbor, said he would attend to my want, and I could be excused. Not wishing to be considered cowardly, and being very cold, I said, "No, I guess I'll stay to the prayer-meeting; I've attended many a one." I walked in and took my place by the warm stove, while the Rev. Mr. J. and his two evangelists that he had imported from Pennsylvania to help him in his soul-saving business, together with the family and a few neighbors who had gathered in, knelt down to their work. The Rev. Mr. J. leading in prayer, he took me in hand to the throne of grace. He petitioned the good Lord in his abundant mercy to convert me from the error of my ways, and make me an instrument for doing great good in bringing souls to Christ. Each of the evangelists, as he prayed, took me in hand in about the same strain. Indeed, each one that prayed followed suit in like manner. By the time the meeting closed I had got comfortably warm and ready for business. I had become interested. I was anxious to become a Christian. I said to them, after thanking them for the kindly interest they had all manifested in my spiritual welfare, that if they would accept of one proposition I had to make I would become a good Christian and devote the remainder of my days to the cause of Christianity and to the bringing of souls to Jesus. Rev. Mr. J. seemed quite elated, and wished to know what the proposition was. I said, "It is this: your Jesus that you worship says, if you hav faith like a grain of mustard-seed you can move a mountain. I won't be so unreasonable as to ask you to move a mountain with faith like a mustard-seed, but you may hav faith as big as a mountain, and if you'll move a mustard-seed I'll join the church to-morrow." This created quite a commotion. Finally Rev. Mr. J. said, "It doesn't mean a mountain of earth; it means a mountain of sin." "Well," I said, "in the same connection Jesus says, if you hav faith you can handle deadly serpents and they shan't hurt you, and drink deadly poison and it shan't hurt you. Maybe Jesus meant a mountain of rattlesnakes, or perhaps a mountain of strychnin." "What a construction to put upon language!" I said further, "I would like to see either of you gentlemen let a rattlesnake bite you or take a dose of strychnin. You know either would kill you just as quick as it would me." I can not in one letter relate all that was said, but by this time it got so hot that the Rev. Mr. J. said, "This conversation was not very interesting," and demanded that the two evangelists—who were splendid singers—sing a song. So they struck up one of their favorit revival hymns in a loud voice, which of course drowned me right out. When their "song pond" had run out, I was ready with this: "That was a good song and well sung; but there was not one bit of argument in it. Your religion is just like the institution of slavery—it can't stand at the bar of reason one moment." To cut the story short, I held that fort and was the last one to leave that prayer-meeting. E. W. COUNCILMAN.

The Christ Drama Re-enacted Before Our Eyes.

KANSAS CITY, MO., June 30, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been looking for something in your paper concerning the visit of Schweinfurth (Christ), and to-day I see "The Illogical Christians of Kansas City." It would hav been better to hav said the "fanatics" of Kansas City.

While I believe Schweinfurth to be an impostor, and a seeker after notoriety and wealth combined, his claim is just as honest as Jesus Christ's was eighteen hundred years ago, and meets, and will still continue to meet, with opposition until his enemies assassinate him as they did Jesus and all other Christs.

In regard to Schweinfurth being the Christ, or being immoral, I hav this to say. Being a close neighbor of Mrs. Ward, 914 East Fourteenth street, and having known her for some time, I will state that she or Schweinfurth is a credit to any of the mob that made so much noise in the street in front of Mrs. Ward's residence on Fourteenth street. In speaking to a friend of mine—and by the way, a very popular and influential man—concerning the mob, he said: "I looked the crowd over and failed to see a decent man in it. It was principally made up with red-headed women and boys."

I made two attempts to see the so-called Christ, but was thwarted by so many reporters demanding admission to interview him, and failed. The view the sensible Christians took in the matter was that if they gave him plenty of rope he would hang himself, which was good policy for them to follow.

While I hav no use for this or any other Christ, I believe as long as he livs up to the laws of our country he should hav the protection of the country (see Constitution U. S.). It is sure truth, if they murder him in less than five hundred years he will hav thousands of followers, but if they let him die that will be the end of Schweinfurthism. When he left the city, or the mob supposed he did, they followed to the depot, and the first man they saw with red whiskers having a woman in his charge was a signal for them to make the attack, and so they did, but alas! they woke up the wrong man. He was a gentleman from California on a traveling excursion. They began to say, as they did of old, "Kill him!" "Hang him!" and some even said "Crucify him!" and all such things, and began to even press him sore, and the aforesaid red-headed traveler got his hand to his hip pocket and pulled forth his 44 caliber revolver and demanded them to stand back, and informed them that he would instruct his forefinger to proceed at once to the execution of the whole mob—"as this is the way we do things of this kind in California where I liv." So they began to smell a large rat and at once proceeded to their homes, having lost sight of their Jesus. There was somewhat of a similarity to the multitude of old, as they cried out, "Crucify him! Crucify him!" And so the world moves on, and we hope Freethought and science will finally drive Christ and the preacher both out. O. B. FOX.

Plain Words to a Cardinal.

NEWARK, July 4, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Cardinal Gibbons's pastoral letter calling attention to the allocution of Pope Leo on the unveiling of a monument in Rome to the memory of Bruno, was read to the pope's subjects in all the Catholic churches in America. He says those impious men who hav abused liberty by raising a statue to Bruno hav done so not to honor Bruno, but to insult the pope. He denounces Bruno as an apostate monk, who did not believe in the divinity of Christ, and who was a wild theorizer, a shameless writer, and an unbeliever in God, and who has slept in an obscure grave for three centuries.

Yes, Cardinal Gibbons, his body has been lying in a grave where papist murderers consigned it, and Freethinkers hav built him a monument in that Unholy City where he was murdered, and where so many martyrs hav perished by the rack, stake, and sword. Your popish cruelties lasted many centuries, and you and your unholy bigots feel alarmed at the erection of the great man's statue, erected near where he was burnt. Don't be afraid, Mr. Cardinal; that is not the only monument that will be raised in Rome. It is the intention to raise a monument to every martyr who has been slain by your murdering crew. The next one will be raised in Bologna, where Monsignor Bediniryo entered as a spy in the year 1849, and was instrumental in sacrificing many lives; where Hugo Bassi, the patriotic priest, was skinned alive and then shot before his widowed mother's house. Yes, Mr. Cardinal, heir to a throne, Hugo Bassi's monument will be built on the spot where he was murdered, as sure as the great god of Nature is omnipotent and is the father of the pagan, Jew, Mohammedan, and Christian. You need not be afraid of their ghosts. Dead men never tell any tales. They are as harmless as your masses which are supposed to fumigate and purify fools' souls. Intelligent people's souls want no fixing, and if they do they hav sense enough to do it themselvs. As for me, I don't want any blessing from man-Gods. Nature is my guide, my god, and my helper, who brought me in this world and who, in time, I am sure, will return me to Mother Earth, consecrated by Nature's god before popish Antichrists or pagan wooden gods were ever made on this earth. Now, in conclusion, Mr. Cardinal, don't call these patriotic men who erected the monument to Bruno fanatics, for those men hav cast away your popish, narrow, contracted superstitions. Your church is too old to teach wisdom or knowledge. Your god is a sectarian, and sits in a palace at Rome. He represents Christ. He is called the vicar of Christ. And you are heir to the same. I cannot see there is any resemblance to Christ. One was barefoot; no home, no money. He was a circumcised Jew. Your pope is a Christian. You are bona fide uncircumcised Jews, and nothing else. Why call yourselvs Christians when you worship Christ, the son of a carpenter? His mother you assert for a fact was the mother of God. Impossible for a creature of nature to be the mother of nature. And because Bruno doubted this fable—that was of pagan origin long before this world was cursed with politicians called popes or vicars—you burnt this wise and good man. And because we honor and cherish this martyr, you fellows with handles and titles to your names whine and cry like children, because reason has dethroned superstition. No use whining, cardinal. We are marching on, and will continue to march on, to storm your hell, that is paved with infant skulls, as your Christian fanatics hav asserted, and your heaven that is filled with murderers, thieves, harlots, and libertins. We do not intend to stop until we hav captured both of those places. The heaven is the top story of the tenement and hell is in the basement. I think Old Nick is pretty tired burning souls that popes hav damned. Respectfully, W. W. Morris.

"A Sulphurous Lecture."

Philadelphia, June 22, 1891.

Mr. Editor: It may be of interest to the readers of the grand old Truth Seeker to read a short report of Mr. Watts's lectures with us yesterday as per announcement. It givs me very great pleasure to state that the lectures were a grand success notwithstanding the very inclement weather. The rain poured down in torrents until within one hour of the afternoon lecture, thereby preventing people that lived a long distance coming. Still, we had a very much larger audience than I expected, and the evening audience was all that could be desired, as Old Sol stopped weeping awhile to giv the people a chance to come and hear this "sulphurous lecture," as it was described to me by some Christian friend. The title of Mr. Watts's discourse in the afternoon was, "The Land, the People, and the Coming Struggle," and judging from the frequent applause the lecture was highly appreciated. In fact, he brought down the house as he dealt his sledge-hammer blows against land monopoly and class legislation. I may say the Single Taxers were in their glory hearing their views expounded by such an able orator. The subject of Mr. Watts's discourse for the evening was, "Religion Without Theology," which in my opinion was a master-piece, for he held his large audience spell-bound listening to the scathing impeachment of orthodoxy. He very forcibly showed the advantage of natural religion to supernatural religion so that a child could understand it. The lecturer said that the former adopted all the good that was in all religions, and only rejected the error. Natural religion, said he, taught us to be good not for a reward after death, but for the reward that may follow here and now, while supernaturalism was built on fear (and allow me to add, on selfishness also). I must confess that I was somewhat perplexed to know how the lecturer was going to make out his case; but, like a shrewd, able lawyer, he accomplished it to the entire satisfaction of his audience, judging from the tremendous applause he received during the lecture. There was only one exception that I could not indorse, and that is, the lecturer said that natural religion adopted all that was good in supernatural religion. Now, I positivly deny that there is one iota of good in supernatural religion, for, as the lecturer showed himself, we can hav no conception of the goodness of that which we hav no idea of. Therefore, all the good that is alleged in supernatural religion is purely natural. Before I close I must not omit to mention that we had the pleasure of listening to a splendid dramatic recital by Mrs. Chas. Watts previous to the evening lecture, which was well received. At the close of the meeting the president presented her with a splendid bouquet, with a few appropriate remarks, assuring her that it was a gift from the admiring members of the League. We were pleased to see Mrs. and Mr. Watts looking so well. There was criticism at the close of both lectures. But I was busy counting the collections—or filthy lucre, as Christians call it, and which they are so eager to grasp that they hav not the common honesty to pay their own tax, but rely on Freethinkers to pay it for them. I allude now to their God-houses being exempt from taxation. So that I could not tell the gist of the remarks made by the critics. I am pleased to learn that Mr. Watts has lecture engagements in his nativ country, and hope that he will hav a pleasant journey and a safe return to do a good deal more missionary work in these United States. For without flattery, and without disparagement to other lecturers in the field, I regard him as the best expounder of Freethought that it has been my privilege to hear.

A Defest in Christian Charity.

Fredericton, N. B., June 13, 1891.

Mr. Editor: The priest, F. Devine, of St. John, N. B., chronicles in the following pathetic poem a circumstance which is unhappily not too rare in our land of boasted civilization and Christian philanthropy; and which actually took place in one of the northern counties of our province. When ministers, followers of "the meek and lowly savior," turn their backs on the erring and unfortunate, and forbid their flock to shelter them, it does not take long to make up our minds that Christianity is not the unmixed blessing that preachers and professors of religion would hav us think it to be.

The Honorable Judge Wetmore, of the New Brunswick supreme court, in addressing the grand jury referred to the matter as follows: "The poor girl had been grossly imposed upon, and had no friends to look after her, was an outcast from society, and the hand of humanity was refused her in her bereavement. Her circumstances must hav been known to the community, and she should not hav been left to die like a dog. She had been unpardonably overlooked, neglected, exposed to the weather and the scorn of mankind, treated as no human being should be treated in a civilized country, and I hav been informed her clergyman even turned his back upon her in her sad hour of need and forbade others to shelter her. I think it was the peculiar business of the overseers of the poor to hav cared for her, and they hav been criminally derelict in the discharge of their duty."

Martin Butler.

THEY TURNED HER OUT IN THE STREET.

They turned her out in the street at night,—
They turned her out in the street!
Her sorrow was heavy, her garments light,—
In form a woman, in years a child,
Her weeping eyes were large and wild,
For her hopes were ruined, her love beguiled,
As they turned her out in the street.

Without a friend, without a home,
They turned her out in the street;
Sick and naked the town to roam,
They turned her out in the street.
The pane was frozen, the mercury low,
Wildly drifted the wintry snow,
As they slammed the door and bade her go,
And turned her out in the street.

In a country cottage a mother prayed,
Her spirit broken, her heart dismayed,
That God would cherish her hope and pride,
Her only support (she had none beside),
And homeward to mother her steps would guide,
As they turned her out in the street.

And peeping out from the drifted pile,
Was a woman's face with a heavenly smile,
A face so sad, a form so bare,
The cold snow matted in her hair,
And her prayerful eyes in a vacant stare,
Where they turned her out in the street.

And beside the mother and near the wall,
Where they turned her out in the street,
Wrapped in an old and tattered shawl,
Where they turned her out in the street,
Like a spotless angel in disguise,
Was a little baby, a doll in size,
With its first tears frozen in its eyes
Where they turned her out in the street.

Now It Is Truth in History That Is Wanted.

Marquette, Kan., July 1, 1891.

Mr. Editor: I hav just been entertained by a book agent, which fact needs no elaboration of explanation to giv the full impression of all its importance in all its bearings, but out of it has grown a suggestion which seems to me not improper nor totally worthless to present to The Truth Seeker.

You are aware, Mr. Editor, that human convictions depend almost entirely upon our educational sources of information, and reasoning from this fact we can arrive at no other conclusion than that those educational sources are as much at variance with each other as the different positions of thought upon every conceivable subject among individuals and societies, and, to a certain sense, in governments. I desire now more particularly to refer to historical information, with reference to which I am about to make a suggestion. It may appear frightful at the start, the suggestion or insinuation that history may and does convey wrong and even false impressions, but this is nevertheless a fact, and that too in the very teeth of every historian's most solemn declarations that he has been guided only by a sincere desire to portray the truth. I will giv but a single instance, amply sufficient to explain and justify what I say and suggest.

There is a certain condensed history of the world in which these words occur relativ to Napoleon Bonaparte: "He divorced Josephine in order that he might marry Maria Louise." With not one word to explain the act either to justify or condemn—no motiv set forth, no prelude of policy, no following of unexampled generosity that bespoke a heart not wholly dead under ambition's curse—but alone in its bald brutality. A vindictiv author has by this means endeavored to brand with infamy the memory of the speechless dead. However bad Napoleon Bonaparte may hav been, how good shall we regard Constantine when we compare the disposal of Josephine with that of Fausta? And how shall we reverence the Christian account of both?—the one so near to Christ, the other so near to Satan, their acts so infinitly inverse? And now, Mr. Editor, comes my suggestion: There are many readers of The Truth Seeker who read to get truth, but they hav learned that authors will not, nay, cannot write without giving color of their own bias and prejudices to every event they record. Under those circumstances they must choose the writings of the fairest authors in pairs at least, so that they can judge for themselvs between the prejudices that make and perpetuate the differences of opinion that manifest themselvs in friendly debates, in social quarrels, and even in national wars.

But how shall we be able to select these authors in order to obtain that conservativ wisdom, which once established would go far toward the temporal salvation of mankind? I will tell you. Hav some one of your able writers who is competent for the task giv us a series of articles in The Truth Seeker in which will be fully shown up, or as much so as would be admissible, the personal prejudices of every important historian, giving, perhaps, one or more illustrations from each. I would myself giv five times the cost of such information in pamphlet form if I could get it, as I am now trying to decide between George Rawlinson's seven volumes of ancient history, etc., and some other work. Such a pamphlet would sell to every reader. Christians would buy it to enable them to steer clear of everything tainted with Infidelity, and Infidels would buy it to enable them to select the best Christian authorities. Will you not giv us something of the kind? Respectfully, C. Putnam.

Many Topics.

Lexington, Ky., June 25, 1891.

Mr. Editor: How noble is Mr. Ballou's defense of Anarchy, reminding us of the fact that the man who is governed is not a free agent; no individual is responsible for his actions but the one who does as he pleases. The "consensus of the competent" no doubt suppose that they alone are right; all others must be cajoled or driven into the path of duty.

But the majority of our race are yet savage. Their greedy emotions and love of present enjoyment extinguish feelings which are truly noble and patriotic.

Each successiv time when society rises to the grandeur of civilization the masses are trampled low by the powerful. Luxury is yet an unsubdued dragon. Destructiv elements and diseases are also crushing. And millions sink into graves of misery, penury—into pitiless oblivion. A few survive. Then what a grand civilization it is, when the only successful teachers of the Golden Rule were Wat Tyler and Cromwell, who placed a rope round a man's neck before they attempted to giv him a lesson on gentleness and the peace of heaven.

Let capitalists, tyrants, any other pack of human wolves, take notice: this is their alternativ—these bad boys in the apple-tree; tufts of grass will be thrown at such miscreants, and if these are not effectiv more convincing arguments are within reach.

And thus are men taught the beauty of justice, good sense, and politeness.

The present race of men will fade away, only a few lonely tombs will be precious, where in holy silence lie the hearts of Socrates and Wilberforce and the rest like them.

They say that the reservation of land for worthy citizens is "touching capitalists in a tender place." It must be that no one feels acutely but them. The very idea of decency is a "stunner" to some people.

But I think that the mass of the people can be trusted to civilize the world. Sometimes the flood-gates of their wrath are opened, and a burst of fury cleanses society till it is pure again.

Eschylus in his "Prometheus" loves to press the universe to his torn and bleeding heart. There are such individuals. Their powers of acute perception benefit the world more than crowns and bushels of Christian diamonds—Christian virtues which grow more brutal every day.

Anarchy need not be violent. There are thousands who prefer good to evil. They are not tempted to sin. Their strength will be evident to all when the reins of "a good example" fall into their hands, and the worn-out slaves of luxury are prostrate on the earth. They will fall with their gold, by their own weight.

Mr. Browning hints that Alcestis was happier than the one she died for.

Uncle Toby thought the world was wide enough for all, even the most lowly organization.

If the mission of Christians has failed to bring goodness and happiness to the world, let others profit by their selfish example and choose a better way.

Nothing prospers, in the world of matter or thought, without some powerful incentiv, a kind of heaven in the future, which will reward pain and trouble. What has the wretch to hope for, who toils all day for a crust and dingy hut, without comforts, sweet flowers, good schools, and lovely teachers for his children? The humblest child pants for a sweet smile, a cheerful grain of information, and nothing is more desolate to the poor than a call from a Christian, who is meddlesome and rude, harrowing up the mind, whose great anxiety is to earn an humble living. Christians destroy the dignity of the laborer's mind and hasten his downfall.

Is the mind of the world progressiv and hastening toward that glorious goal, mental and moral, indicated by the noble expressions of such men as Dionysius of Halicarnassus? He says, "Eschylus had a just conception of what constitutes the dignity of human nature." Do moderns aspire to any such perfection? No, the greatest man now is the one who can snatch or steal the most millions. Luxury is the cobra, the viper, who has done this, for sweet nature's atoms are not completely blind. In them are firmly planted the roots of thought. They cling to the truest uses of life. They are able with supernal knowledge to seek and recognize their friends, giving them a hearty welcome.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fal River, Mass., to whom all Communications for his Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Retribution.

An old black crow sat on a tree,
Where staid a bird's nest cosily;
Four little eggs were in the nest,
By a mother's love warmed and blest.
At noon, the mother hied away
For a drink in heat of day.
Down hopped the crow, "Now for a lunch,
And in this egg I'll make a punch!"
So saying, he quickly dispatched
The four blue eggs meant to be hatched,
Now it turned out and chanced to be,
That two king-birds this act did see.
"We'll fix him! We'll fix him!
For these eggs he shall dearly pay."
At him they flew with sharpened bill,
And pecked his face and eyes, until
Blood flowed free, and the crow fell down
In a meadow outside the town.
The king-birds then pecked from his head
The feathers, till 'twas raw and red;
They pulled the plumage from his back,
'Till wings and bones did fairly crack,
And that poor crow you would not know,
As to the forest, weak and slow,
He went his way, pursued by those
Two unrelenting, vengeful foes.
A blind and bloody crow was he,
All racked with pain and agony,
When weak he reached the wooded shade,
Beyond the meadow and the glade,
And there resolved he never would
Steal eggs again, for fun or food.

May you to heart this moral take,
And keep it there for your own sake:
Who wrongs his neighbor or his friend,
Must surely suffer in the end.

Biographical Sketches of Ancient and Modern Poets.

II.—SPENSER.

Edmund Spenser, one of the popular poets during Queen Elizabeth's reign, was born in London in the year 1553. Some claim that he was of good family connections, that is to say wealthy, but the popular opinion is that he was very poor. A certain poet, by the name of Ben Jonson, writing to a friend claims that he died "for lack of bread." But we will speak more of that later on. The most popular poem that he ever wrote is "The Faerie Queen." Taine, in speaking of it, declares it to be a masterpiece of art. It is filled with gods, fairies, etc. In one of his poems he bewails the death of a dear friend, Sir Philip Sidney, as "Astrophel." You will notice that he writes something in the style of Chaucer.

The gods, which all things see, this same beheld,
And pitying this paire of lovers trew,
Transformed them there, lying on the field,
Into one flower, which is red and blew;
It first grows red, and then to blew does fade,
Like Astrophel, which thereinto was made.

Spenser was a great lover of nature, as his writing plainly shows. He did marry, but his wife's name died with her. Not an uncommon thing, especially in those days when women were only valued as companions of men, but it is to be hoped that we will outgrow that superstition with the others.

It seems that he had trouble also. History gives us a pathetic account of his house being burnt to the ground during a rebellion. Spenser and his wife escaped, but their youngest child was burnt to death. It is thought that this hastened his death, for he died shortly afterward, on January 15, 1599. It is not taken for granted that Jonson was right, but it seems probable, since Jonson was so well informed. So, according to his word, he was buried in Westminster Abbey, beside Chaucer, at the expense of the earl of Essex.

IDA A. BALLOU.

What the Little Ones Are Saying.

A minister's little daughter, who had been to church for the first time and heard her father preach, was questioned by him on reaching home as to how she liked his sermon. There was an embarrassed silence. Then the little maid, tired out with the long strain of "being good," and yet anxious not to offend in any wise, made answer, with a long-drawn breath of patient resignation:

"You preached awful long, papa, but I beared it."

"Now, mamma, I——"

Thus the child began, and was stopped short by her mother.

"Lottie, how many times I've told you not to begin with 'Now.' It is 'Now, mamma,' 'Now, I can't,' 'Now, I will,' Now something or other continually. Don't say it again! The very first time you do I will send you to stand fifteen minutes in the corner."

Little Lottie knew full well the terrors of that punishment. What an eternity it seemed to her to stand that length of time with her face to the wall, not allowed to turn around or speak till told that the time was out, for always after about three minutes she felt sure that the fifteen minutes must be passed, and that she, forgotten, must stand there always! So cautious Lottie retreated with her doll out of mamma's hearing, and it being already late in the day escaped condemnation.

When the little nightgown had been donned and mamma said tenderly, "Now, darling, say your little prayer," Lottie failed to notice how the catcher had been caught on the "Now," but answered:

"I can't—I mustn't."

"Lottie! Why not?"

"'Cause if I say my '—— I lay me' I must stand in the corner."

The Danger from Scarlet Fever.

In scarlet fever and diphtheria the period of incubation is brief, a few days only, and during this period there is no contagion. It is very important to know that in scarlet fever the period of greatest danger is after the disappearance of the fever, the period of desquamation or peeling. From ignorance of this fact many lives hav been lost. Persons hav gone into society before the peeling was completed, and, almost of course, hav communicated the disease. The fact is that every particles of the scales contains thousands of microbes.—Youth's Companion.

Correspondence.

CAMERON, Mo., June 28, 1891.

DEAR SUSAN: I thought I would write you a letter for fear you and the Cornerites had forgotten there was such a girl as I. I am twelve years old, and liv in the country, five miles from Cameron. Cameron is a city which has eight thousand inhabitants. It has no Liberal hall, but there are many wealthy Liberals in Cameron. This spring Mr. Remsburg, Sr., offered to lecture if they could raise the money. I wish they would hav procured his services and that they would get a Liberal hall. If I were a man. I would strive my best to hav a lecture, and not only a lecture, but a hall where the people could hav all the lectures they wanted. As you said that we would probably hav to wait till the young folks grow up before we can get a young folk's paper, I hope they will commence and grow fast. I will hav to close, as my letter is getting long. I will close, wishing you great success.

Your Liberal friend, MARY LIVENGOOD.

[There is certainly a good time coming by and by, when girls like Mary are grown to womanhood. Just wait and see.—ED. C. C.]

ROCHELLE, ILL., June 27, 1891.

MISS WIXON, Dear Friend: Your most interesting Corner has not heard from me for over five years, but as regular as the week comes around hav I heard from the Cornerites.

I enjoy hearing the young advocates of our cause speak their opinions publicly, and I look forward to a day when we will find the world much wiser than to-day, for the world is producing too many great minds to continue longer in its old religious ideas.

Then we can say that our fathers were among the first to learn the truth, and I freely say that I think it to be the truth.

What we as young Freethinkers should now strive for, is that we travel the correct road as moral men and moral women, that in a later day it may be said of us, "It must be so, for thou reasonest well."

I was very glad to see the introduction of the Young Men's Freethought Temperance Society, and immediately took the pledge and became a member of the same.

I hope every member of the society will endeavor to make it a success and aid others in becoming moral men and true women, and soon the church will be compelled to admit that Christianity is not necessary for morality.

May every young man in our ranks take the pledge and become an activ member of the society.

Since my birth liquors hav always been within my reach, and I hav had the opportunity to drink if I wished, but since I hav been old enough to see the effects of alcohol, I hav not tasted it, and now, being sixteen years of age, I can truthfully say that I do not drink, chew, smoke, or swear, and I am proud of it.

Having about finished the high school of this city, I intend in the fall to enter business college in Chicago, after which I may become some day the proprietor of the popular "Rochelle Jewelry Store," with the same name as its present owner.

Well, I am afraid I hav already taken up too much space and time. Mother and father send their best regards.

Will close. With best wishes to yourself and friends of the Corner, I remain,

Yours for reason and morality,

OTTO WETTSTEIN, JR.

[We may be sure the good cause is progressing when the Corner is graced by such sentiments as above. Otto is the worthy son of worthy parents, and we hope to hear from him often.—ED. C. C.]

BUFFALO, N. Y., July 1, 1891.

TO MISS WIXON AND THE CORNERITES: I hav often thought of addressing you through the columns of the Corner if its editor was willing. And to-day it is so quiet and cool that I feel "inspired" to put my theory into practice. And then, too, remembering the old adage, "Put not off till to-morrow what ought to be done to-day," I concluded to profit by it. Still, when one really wants to do anything he very seldom "puts off till to-morrow," unless it is inevitable that he should do so.

But so much for that. I did not intend to hav that for my subject or dwell upon it.

There are people, and lots of them, too, who are valiant fighting with that mighty weapon, the pen, for "woman's rights," and others for the "rights of the individual," and others for—but why continue?

We all know that the human race is divided into about three classes:

The valiant and energetic race,
The indifferent race, and
The ignorant race.

But, I think, we will all come to one unanimous conclusion, that there is one race, and the most important one of all, that is rather neglected. There seem to be only a few who really advocate "children's rights" at all. And I say, it is too bad. Even at our mother's knee, where we are supposed to receive the blessed education that will enable us to fight our way through the world, we are told a pack of lies that would successfully rival the "champion liar!" Then when we grow older and know the truth, we are brought face to face with the fact that the loving and gentle mother has not only deceived us, but willfully lied! That is the first lesson. Oh, it is no wonder that the sensitiv hearts of children are hurt, and that they shrink from confiding to the mother, for fear of censure! I do not blame the mother so much, for she was treated the same in her childhood, and has come to look upon the falsehoods as necessary. But I grow impatient at their stupidity, when hearing them exclaim, in regard to wayward children who bring the early gray hairs in their parents' heads, "Why, these children must hav been born wicked! I cannot think how they could hav gone astray. Their parents are both very kind."

I will answer them in the earnest words of Mrs. Browning:

Do you question the young children in their sorrow,
Why their tears are falling so?
The old man may weep for his to-morrow,
Which was lost in Long Ago—
The old tree is leafless in the forest—
The old year is ending with the frost—
The old wound, if stricken, is the sorest—
The old hope is hardest to be lost;
But the young, young children, oh my brothers,
Do you ask them why they stand
Weeping sore before the bosoms of their mothers,
In our happy fatherland?

But "the dawn of deliverance" is at hand. People are beginning to question the idea that they had taken as an undisputed truth. Freedom is gradually working her way upward, and casting aside the old worn-out garment of servitude.

Her open eyes desire the truth, and she shall hav it! No matter how obnoxious truth is to our old-fashioned ideas of morality, we must accept the facts as inevitable. And as was said of old,

The little child shall lead them.

For

The child's sob in the silence curses deeper
Than the strong man in his wrath.

Ever your friend, IDA A. BALLOU.

Ingersoll's Lectures Complete. Bound in one volume. To meet the demand for Mr. Ingersoll's works, the publisher has had all his lectures, except the latest on "Orthodoxy," bound in one beautiful volume, in half calf, library style, and containing over 1,300 pages, which is sold at the exceedingly low price of $5. Sent by mail postpaid.

Tributes. There hav been so many applications for Mr. Ingersoll's "The Vision of War," the "Grant Banquet Toast," that they hav been printed on heavy toned paper, 18x22, illuminated border, and in large, clear type, suitable for framing, and the three will be forwarded to any address, for 25 cts, or either one for 15 cts.

Prose Poems and Selections. This new book is a gem. It is a model in every respect. In fact, one of the richest, brightest, best ever issued. It contains, besides the celebrated "Decoration Day Oration," never before published, and all the famous "tributes" heretofore printed in various shapes, but never brought together till now, many other gems, selected from the speeches, arguments, lectures, letters, table-talks, and day-to-day conversations of the author. The work is designed for and will be accepted by admiring friends as a rare personal souvenir. To help it serve this purpose, a fine steel portrait, with autograph fac simile, has been prepared especially for it. Price, in silk cloth, beveled edges, gilt back and side, $2.50; in half calf, mottled edges, elegant library style, 4.50; in full Turkey morocco, gilt, exquisitly fine, 7.50; in full tree calf, highest possible style and finish, $9.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. Price 25 cents.

OTTO WETTSTEIN,
ROCHELLE, ILL.

Send 10 cents for this valuable book for young and middle-aged men, suffering from a Life-wasting Disease, as the result of youthful follies, indiscretion, and excesses in maturer years. It sets forth an External Application—A POSITIVE CURE, as it matters not how long standing, how hopeless or how many remedies you hav used. The book is worth many times its cost, and should be in the hands of those seeking a speedy and permanent cure. Address Dr. Robt. P. Fellows, Vineland, N. News of the Week.

THE first number of a serial publication of the constitutions of all nations, now insufficiently known, contains Mexico's constitution, which distinctly separates church and state, forbids establishment or prohibition of religion, forbids acquisition by a church of real estate beyond buildings in actual use, and supplants oaths by affirmations.

A GRAND monument to Jefferson Davis will be erected at Richmond.

WOULD commercial reciprocity promote or retard Canadian annexation? is now debated.

AN exhibit of the development of the American Catholic press is proposed for the World's Fair.

MORMONS in Chihuahua and Sonora, Mexico, are turning a wilderness into a seat of fertility and thrift.

BLAINE is acknowledged to hav been ill, and to be not well yet, but is said to be rapidly improving.

WILLIAM II.'s visit may cause accession of England to the Triple Alliance of Germany, Austria, and Italy against France and Russia.

OF the income of the Church of England last year, £5,753,557, £208,438 came from private benefactions since 1703, the rest from ancient endowments.

THE pope is indignant at the Triple Alliance contract, and condemns the clause guaranteeing Italy's integrity and excluding papal claims to restoration of temporal power.

GERMANY is about to acquire territory in Morocco which may embroil her with Spain.

THE British government has been asked to act in regard to the mortality of religious pilgrimages from India to Mecca. One-third of the fanatical pilgrims perish.

HUMBUG is rampant at the shrine of St. Anne de Beaupre, Quebec. A dispatch of the 2d says: "Hardly a day passes that miracles are not performed. Yesterday a man named Desire Raymond, from Lewiston, Me., who was suffering from a fractured leg and unable to walk without crutches, received holy communion and afterward walked away from the sacred table without his crutches, wholly cured."

SIR JOHN THOMPSON is being opposed by Canadian Protestants as premier because he is "a man of north of Ireland Methodist parents, who at one time taught a Methodist Sunday-school, but who, under peculiar circumstances, forsook the faith of his fathers and went into the church of Rome and threw himself into the arms of the extreme section of that church, made league with the Jesuits and sent his sons to be educated in their colleges, and who" favors separate schools in Manitoba.

AT the execution of the four murderers at Sing Sing the press of New York deliberately violated the section of the new electrical execution law which reads: "No account of the details of any such execution, beyond the statement of the fact that such convict was, on the day in question, duly executed according to law at the prison, shall be published in any newspaper." This provision is denounced as an infamous infringement of liberty of expression, and will doubtless be repealed.

REV. JAS. BRADY, of Newark, N. J., last Sunday blackguarded the Saengerfest, an innocent open-air festival of Germans, hated by parsons because of its diverting Sunday crowds from their congregations. He began by saying that all who were concerned in last Sunday's concert should be fined $10 apiece. He said the singers were like the Turners, mainly Atheists, and "sinful, recreant, Sabbath-breaking, beer-swilling Germans." He called special attention to the cantata of "Delilah and Samson," and said he had no doubt that the woman who sang it felt all the tenderness that the song depicted. He wanted to know why they could not sing "From Greenland's Icy Mountains," instead of the music of the devil. "Music!" he went on; "why, it is only Atheistical wind. Music comes from the church of God. How dare these Infidels use the weapons of the church to overthrow her grandest institution—the Christian Sabbath!" He closed with an earnest hope that the Germans might be converted to devote their musical talents to singing about glory and heaven.

THE LAST OF JEZEBEL.

And they went to bury her; but they found no more of her than the skull, and the feet, and the palms of her hands. Wherefore they came again, and told him. And he said, This is the word of the Lord, which he spake by his servant Elijah the Tishbite, saying, In the portion of Jezreel shall dogs eat the flesh of Jezebel.—2 Kings ix, 35, 36.

Gems of Thought.

HISTORY is made up only of declarations which gain credit by repetition.—Napoleon Bonaparte.

Is this Utopian? A map of the world that does not include Utopia is not worth even glancing at, for it leaves out the one country at which humanity is always landing. And when humanity lands there, it looks out, and, seeing a better country, sets sail. Progress is the realization of Utopias.—Oscar Wilde.

WITH respect to the authority of great names it should be remembered that he alone deserves to hav any weight of influence with posterity, who has shown himself superior to the particular and predominant error of his own times.—Colton.

LONG before Christianity had a place, there were vast libraries. There were thousands of schools before a Christian existed on the earth. There were hundreds of hospitals before a line of the New Testament was written. Hundreds of years before Christ, there were hospitals in India—not only for men, women, and children, but even for beasts. There were hospitals in Egypt long before Moses was born. They knew enough then to cure insanity with music. They surrounded the insane with flowers, and treated them with kindness.—Ingersoll.

LET me hav my own way,

IT is the special evil of intolerance that it entwines itself around the holiest parts of our nature, and becomes at last so blended with the sense of duty that, as has been finely said, "conscience, which restrains every other vice, becomes the prompter here." Two or three times in the history of mankind its destruction has involved a complete dissolution of the moral principle by which society coheres, and the cradle of religious liberty has been rocked by the worst passions of humanity.—Lecky.

IN the natural pride and impatience of human nature, which rebels against the insurmountable limitations of knowledge, and disdains and dislikes the humility of the method of its attainment, by patiently and painfully conforming to fact, there is a deep and last source of error. Man would fain be above nature, not as its culminating blossom, but as something essentially apart from it in his highest qualities—a being created to govern and use it for his ends, and for whom it was created; instead of, as he is actually, a part of it that develops from, and in, and for it, and commands only by obeying.—Maudesley.

JABVEH is alleged to be infinit, yet when we refer to the Bible we find that the Bible God walks (Gen. iii, 8), talks (Deut. v, 24), smells (Gen. viii, 21), works (Gen. ii, 2), rests (Gen. ii, 2). We are told that he is unchangeable, yet we find upon examination that the Bible God repents (Gen. vi, 6). We are informed that he is all good, yet we find that God curses (Gen. iii, 14), hardens men's hearts (Ex. xiv, 4), delivers men into the devil's power (Job ii, 6), punishes the guiltless (1 Sam. xv, 3), creates evil (Is. xlv, 7), makes some men the slaves of others (Ex. xxi, 2), and orders the wholesale slaughter of men, women, and children (1 Sam. xv).—*Arthur B. THEOLOGICAL SCARECROWS—HOW FOOLS ARE FRIGHTENED INTO THE FOLD.

Notes and Clippings.

A TOLSTOI community at Kharkoff, Russia, containing a number of educated men who hav left society, has been suppressed by the government.

THE Scottish Mission, which has its headquarters at Jerusalem, reports the conversion of six Jews to Presbyterianism at a cost of $5,000 apiece.

A FRENCH provincial newspaper has been condemned to pay two hundred francs damages for calling several residents of its town Freemasons. To call a man a Freemason in France is to bring him into hatred, ridicule, and contempt of his Roman Catholic townsmen.

THE Russian inland steamship company, "Samölet," has named one its steamers Leo Tolstoi, in honor of the renowned novelist. This givs great displeasure to the intensely religious press. Voozhniy Kray of Kharkov and Vladomosti of St. Petersburg think that it is very improper on the part of "an orthodox company in holy Russia" to do honor to the name of a heretic like Tolstoi.

THE Salvation Army in all is now made up of 4,289 distinct organizations, commanded by 10,449 officers. During the past year there has been an increase of 255 organizations. The total circulation of their periodicals is over half a million. There are twenty-seven War Crys outside of England, published in thirty-five countries, and in fifteen languages. The army has made particular progress in India.

THE Austrian high court of appeals has delivered a tremendous shock to Roman Catholic priests who hav renounced orders and subsequently married, and they are not few. One who has been ordained a priest in 1857 announced to the civil and clerical authorities in 1870 that he had abandoned the Catholic faith and become an evangelical. In 1879 he married and lived happily until, a year or two ago, his marriage had to be legally tested, and it was pronounced invalid. He appealed, but now the highest court announces that the present state of legislation does not permit a man who has vowed celibacy to be freed from his vow.—Sun.

THE municipal authorities of the city of Treves, Germany, are busily preparing for the enormous influx of children which is expected to take place next August, on the occasion of the exhibition of the "Holy Coat of Treves," popularly and authoritativly announced to be the identical garment woin by the savior, and for which the soldiers present at the crucifixion cast lots. One of the most remarkable things in connection with this exhibition is the fact that the police force will be doubled; and another is that a committee of purity will be established, proving that, as in American camp-meetings, the world, the flesh, and the devil are not entirely absent from the most sacred functions.—World.

THE preachers of the dissenting Russian sects hav been warned that they are incurring the risk of Siberia, and the public officials throughout the empire are making it a practice to break up by any means in their power the meetings of the dissenters. The persecution is not confined to one sect, or to several. All the sects known to the authorities are being harrassed, and the Roman Catholic and Lutheran religions, barely tolerated in St. Petersburg, are suppressed mercilessly in Poland and the German provinces of Russia on the Baltic. No new churches are permitted to be built and the authorities are ordered to shut up the old church buildings, whenever, as structures, they become dangerous. It does not take long for the town or city officers to find that the Catholic or Lutheran church is dangerous.

THE Hon. Honoré Mercier, the premier of Quebec, has been made a count by the pope. This is the message from Leo XIII.: "Well-beloved son. Greeting and apostolic benediction: Your distinguished merits toward us and this apostolic see, the remarkable zeal with which you hav responded to our desires for the good of the Catholic cause in the different conflicts provoked in that province of Canada, the care you hav taken to protect the rights of the religious societies, and the other Christian qualities of your character hav induced us to . . . constitute Count you, your children, and your descendants in the male line of primogeniture only, provided they are born of legitimate wedlock and persevere in the Catholic religion and fidelity to the holy see. In consequence, we grant to you and your descendants the right and privilege to use and enjoy all the honors, rights, prerogativs, preëminences, etc., appertaining by law, use, or custom to those decorated with this title of nobility."

AN anecdote of Darwin: Year after year facts in substantiation of Darwin's evolution theory were accumulated and discussed with his friends until, twelve years after (in 1856), Sir Charles Lyell advised him to expand and revise his memoranda and prepare them for publication. The book was about half completed when a singular incident occurred, which reveals as nothing else could the thorough unselfishness of Darwin's nature. He received one day a letter from a young Welsh naturalist, Mr. A. R. Wallace, who was then traveling in the Malay archipelago. To Darwin's amazement it contained an article embodying the exact theory upon which he had been laboring for so many years in secret. The letter contained a request that Darwin would submit the paper to Sir Charles Lyell for consideration at the Linnæan society. Never had a man greater temptation to suppress a rival. Silence would hav sufficed, but Darwin was not silent. He sent the article to Sir Charles Lyell, but the latter and Sir Joseph Hooker protested against the publication of it without a statement from Darwin, who, as they personally knew, had been working on the subject for many years. Darwin was at first unwilling to take any action in the matter to protect himself, fearing that he might do Wallace injustice; but the difficulty was finally arranged through the mediation of friends, so that the rights of both naturalists, who had almost simultaneously conceived the same idea, were shielded. The result was that Wallace's paper, accompanied by a letter from Prof. Asa Gray and an abstract of Darwin's work, were contemporaneously published in July, 1858, in the transactions of the Linnæan society. Thirteen months later, Darwin brought out the work which has immortalized his name, the "Origin of Species."

A Correct Silver Dollar.

Everywhere among civilized nations the two precious metals, gold and silver, as coin—weighed and stamped pieces of these metals—are money. They serve as the standard values for all commodities. They are the money the world over, and they alone are real money.

Paper currency, that is, paper passing for money, although it may answer the purposes of the latter, is not real money, because it lacks the intrinsic value of the same. It consists only of certificates of coin deposited with a government, or of certificates of debt, issued by a government, or by private corporations, banks, controled by law.

The Constitution of the United States, by saying, "No state . . . shall coin money; emit bills of credit; make anything but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts," distinctly recognizes gold and silver coin as the real money of the United States, while the paper currency of this country, not secured by coin or bullion deposited with the government, simply consists of "bills of credit," as they are called by the Constitution.

An act of Congress of Feb. 12, 1873, says that the one-dollar gold-piece, at the standard weight of twenty-five and eight-tenths grains, shall be the unit of value of the United States. Thus, by law, the gold dollar (and gold coin generally) is the standard money of the United States by which the bullion value of the silver dollar of this country is to be regulated. In the commercial intercourse of the leading nations of the globe gold is also the standard money by which the values of all commodities are measured.

The Constitution of the United States, by recognizing both gold and silver coin as the real money of this country, and by making coin of either of these two metals a full legal tender in payment of debts, establishes bimetallism for this country. Silver dollars, therefore, in the United States always may just as well be used for the payment of debts as gold coin, provided payment in the latter is not stipulated by contract. The fractional silver coins and the nickel and bronze coins of this country are subsidiary coins. They hav not an unlimited legal tender power, but can, by law, be offered only for the payment of small sums.

Monometallism means that in a country only coin of one of the two monetary metals named is a full legal tender in payment of all debts, while coin of the other metal has not this quality.

At present, there exists no fixed ratio between gold and silver, as monetary metals, and no free coinage of silver among the leading commercial nations of the globe. Silver, therefore, is now in reality an ordinary commodity. In consequence of this fact, the American standard silver dollar has at this writing (July 4, 1891) only a bullion value of from seventy-eight to seventy-nine cents in gold. It, therefore, cannot be considered as correct money, not being, as to its bullion value, an equivalent of the silver dollar, which it should be by law. In other words, a gold dollar and a silver dollar hav not the same value as pieces of metal. They are only fictitiously equivalent by the stamp of the government placed upon them. The American silver dollar with its present bullion value, can not be used as coin, but only as metal, by the people of this country in their commercial intercourse with foreign nations; it is disliked by them in their own domestic intercourse, and it cannot be rightfully made the basis of free and unlimited coinage of silver in the United States. Such coinage of this silver dollar, depreciated as to its bullion value, would giv the most unjust advantages to the owners of silver bullion in this country. They, by such coinage, at the present price of the metal, would change from seventy-eight to seventy-nine cents' worth of fine or pure silver into money worth one hundred cents in gold. Such free and unlimited coinage of silver would necessarily drive gold out of this country for foreign silver, or at least out of trade into hiding-places, and perhaps cause a gold premium. Moreover, it would probably reduce the value of the silver dollar in trade to its own metallic value, at present to only from seventy-eight to seventy-nine cents in gold, thus enhancing the prices of all commodities throughout the United States.

By an act of Congress of Feb. 28, 1878, compulsory coinage of the standard silver dollar was established in this country, which kind of coinage of the silver dollar, as far as its coinage on government account is concerned, has been continued by act of Congress of July 14, 1890, being the present law on the subject. Such silver coinage should be abolished by Congress as soon as possible and be replaced by free and unlimited coinage of a correct silver dollar, being, as to its bullion value, equal or as nearly equal as possible to the gold dollar. Such a course is simply demanded by justice, and might be taken in the following manner:

The government of this country would be enabled at once to coin a permanently correct silver dollar strictly equal, as to its bullion value, to the gold dollar, in case of an international agreement among the leading commercial nations of the globe, as to a fixed ratio between gold and silver, as monetary metals. It tried to bring about such an agreement by two international conferences held in Europe in 1878 and 1881, and by later efforts, yet in vain, chiefly on account of the opposition of England. Under these circumstances the American people seem to be compelled, by their own interest, independently of other nations, to establish free and unlimited coinage of a temporarily correct silver dollar, until the international agreement referred to will be accomplished. There is plainly not gold enough in the world to serve as coin, as the sole legal-tender money of all or of only the leading nations of the globe, in their domestic and foreign commerce; and then a country is obviously enabled by bimetallism—that is, by free and unlimited coinage of gold pieces and silver coins, correct as to their bullion value—to control a larger amount of good and sound money than by either gold monometallism or silver monometallism—that is, by the use of either gold or silver coin alone, as legal tender for the payment of large sums.

The Constitution of the United States says: "The Congress shall hav power . . . to coin money, regulate the value thereof and of foreign coin." This clause plainly speaks of such a regulation only in a general way, and does not forbid a repeated regulation of the kind. Congress, therefore, has the power, at any time, directly or indirectly to regulate the bullion value of the silver dollar, to be coined in this country, in such a manner that this dollar, as metal, may become correct, nearly, or if possible quite, as valuable as the gold dollar. Furthermore, Congress has the power, directly or indirectly, to attend to this regulation as often as it may become necessary, until the ratio between gold and silver, as monetary metals, will hav been internationally fixed forever. The regulation referred to might best be achieved for the present, if Congress by law would make it the duty of the president of the United States, at stated times, under certain circumstances, and within fixed limits, to ordain the amount of fine or pure silver for the silver dollar, to be coined, by the way of free and unlimited coinage, at the American mints. Such an expedient, presently to be described more fully, would of course come to an end immediately after the adoption of a fixed ratio between gold and silver by an international agreement.

The gold coins of this country having formerly twice been changed by law as to their bullion value, why shall, until an international agreement on the subject will hav been reached, not the silver dollar, to be coined at the American mints, be changed, too, as to its bullion value, so that it may become temporarily correct, representing as nearly as possible a gold dollar's worth of fine or pure silver, according to the current price of this metal in the markets of the world? In answer to this question the following views may be ventured:

Congress might by law ordain the free and unlimited coinage of a temporarily correct silver dollar, as to its bullion value, which coinage might commence at once, after the passage and approval of the respectiv act, and which, when necessary, on account of the fluctuating price of silver, might be changed, as to the bullion value of the silver dollar to be coined, always on and after the 1st day of January following such a necessity. The new, temporary silver dollar, when its coinage would commence, should, agreeably to law, by order of the president of the United States, contain a gold dollar's worth of fine or pure silver, according to the average market price of this metal during the last preceding month. Subsequently, if necessary, a silver dollar with a corrected bullion value, as nearly equal as possible to a gold dollar's worth of fine or pure silver, should always be coined at the American mints, on and after each 1st day of January following. For this reason it might by law be made the duty of the president of the United States annually to ascertain the average market price of silver during the month of December, and accordingly to giv in time the necessary order to the American mints for a correct bullion value of the silver dollar to be coined there during the ensuing year. This order could by law contain a change of the previous bullion value of the silver dollar only, if and so far as such a change would become necessary by the market price of silver during the month of December, as stated. Under an act of Congress of Sept. 26, 1890, the new silver dollar would hav the same diameter as the present standard silver dollar, differing from the latter only in thickness.

The coinage of any, that is, of a certain temporarily correct silver dollar might be continued, until by the fluctuations of the price of silver its bullion value would become one or more per cent more or less valuable than its face value or the gold dollar. Then, by order of the president, according to law, on and after the 1st day of January following, a new, temporary silver dollar, with a bullion value corrected according to the average market price of silver during the preceding month of December, should be coined at the American mints.

As to fluctuations of the market price of silver within a calendar year, the law might provide that, for this reason, the coinage of the temporarily correct silver dollar should not be discontinued in the course of the year. Yet, for these fluctuations, silver bullion, deposited for coinage at the mints of the United States, might, at the wish of the owners of the metal and on their own account, be only reduced to fine bars. Temporarily correct silver dollars coined, as suggested, in two different years, would probably or doubtless be of a different bullion value. Yet this could not be helped and would also do no harm. They would all decidedly be more correct as to their bullion value than the present standard silver dollars.

After the accomplishment of the international agreement repeatedly referred to, all silver dollars of the United States not being in harmony as to their bullion value with the ratio between gold and silver to be fixed by that agreement, would, of course, after the cancellation of the certificates issued for the same, hav to be recoined by the government into permanently correct silver dollars, being in harmony with the agreement.

The law suggested, ordaining free and unlimited coinage of temporarily correct silver dollars, might prescribe that the owners of the silver bullion deposited for coinage at the mint should be entitled to an amount of silver dollars exactly equal in their weight of fine or pure silver to the weight of fine or pure silver deposited for their coinage. Yet the owners of the metal would hav to pay the cost of refining the silver and of the alloy. The new dollars might, of course, at the mints be deposited with the government for silver certificates, to be issued for the same. Moreover, silver bullion from different owners should be coined according to the date and time of its deposition at the mints. Finally, only silver bullion produced in the United States should be coined into temporarily correct silver dollars, while foreign silver bullion, also, if produced by the melting in this country of foreign silver ore, coin, or ornaments, should be excluded from this coinage. The American origin of the silver bullion might always be established by the oath of the owners of the metal. The several legal provisions just suggested would simply be requirements of justice called forth by the nature of the temporarily correct silver dollar. They would, as a matter of course, hav to be repealed after the establishment of free and unlimited coinage of a permanently correct silver dollar, in consequence of an international agreement.

The fractional or subsidiary silver coins of this country, half-dollars, quarter-dollars, and ten-cent pieces (dimes), might best remain undisturbed as to their bullion value, up to the time of the adoption of a fixed and and final ratio between gold and silver as monetary metals by an international agreement, when these subsidiary silver pieces might be coined, too, with a correct bullion value, exactly corresponding to that of the silver dollar piece. In case of the adoption by Congress of free and unlimited coinage of silver, as suggested, the issue of paper money by the government for silver dollars deposited with the same might be regulated in the following manner. The government should issue silver certificates, in denominations ordained by law and desired by depositors, for temporarily and later for permanently correct silver dollars—for the latter, when established by an international agreement. Yet, these silver certificates should always be redeemed by silver dollars of the kind deposited for the same; all temporarily correct silver dollars being considered as belonging to one and the same kind. The kind of silver dollars deposited for them with the government should, of course, always be indicated on the certificates, when being issued for the silver dollars.

The foregoing discussion relates to the adoption, by the American people, of a preliminary measure of very tedious character for bringing about an international agreement as to a fixed ratio between gold and silver as monetary metals for all time to come. That such an agreement is possible and practicable is plain and cannot be doubted. It would hav been accomplished long before this time, if it would not hav been opposed by England. She established gold monometallism in 1816, a thing unknown to the world up to that time, for gaining financial advantages by it over other nations, and she now adheres to it chiefly on account of the bonus her merchants derive from it by their commerce with India, her great dependency in Asia. In India there exists silver monometallism. Yet, a great deal of English capital has been invested there on which the interest has to be paid in gold. To acquire this gold, the Indian government sells in London for gold bills of exchange called "Indian council bills," which are claims for certain sums of silver.

With those bills—their amount sold in London in 1890 aggregated $76,890,000—the English merchants, having bought them, pay for the vast quantities of wheat and cotton they ship from India to England, in which latter country they receive gold for these articles. They thus, in consequence of the gold monometallism of England and of the silver monometallism of India, where the council bills are equivalent to hard money in silver, the standard money of the country, derive from their commerce with India not only their legitimate mercantil profit, but also a gold premium, by the gold they pay for the council bills, representing silver depreciated in the markets of the world, but of a permanently fixed value in India. England, therefore, will not voluntarily consent to an international agreement as to a permanently fixed ratio between gold and silver, as monetary metals. She can be forced to submit to the result of such an agreement among the other civilized countries of the globe only by her own pecuniary interests. The government of the United States should again, but not at present, cause an international conference to be held, perhaps in the city of Washington, for a final settlement of the silver question. Yet, to this conference, for the reasons stated, England should not be invited. The conference should consist, as far as possible, of delegates from all European countries, England excepted, and from all republics of North, Central, and South America. The conference, however, in order to be successful, should be held after the American people would hav tried, for at least a couple of years, free and unlimited coinage of a temporarily correct silver dollar, and after the beneficial effects of such a measure, by a permanently increased price of silver, would hav become evident, thus indicating at the same time the ratio proper, internationally to be fixed between gold and silver as monetary metals. The former inharmonious ratios of France, 1 to 15½, and of the United States, 1 to 16, became extinct in 1873 as to free coinage of silver, when such coinage was abolished in both countries.

If an international conference be held, as suggested, and if a ratio between gold and silver, as monetary metals, be permanently fixed by it, the results of such a ratio would be the following. It would at once be followed by a free and unlimited coinage of silver in all bimetallic and silver monometallic countries, which coinage itself would, of course, support and maintain the ratio agreed upon between gold and silver. Then it would create correct money, rendering gold and silver coin correct, as to their relativ bullion value, throughout the world. Yet, such correct money would prove a blessing to all mankind.

Christianity and Evolution.

CHRISTIANITY AND THE STATE.

Between early Christianity and the paganism which it superseded there were, as we hav shown, many points of agreement. They both arose out of sun worship and nature worship; they each possessed in common many symbols and ceremonies; their teachings were in the main similar. But the new faith had this advantage—the lofty character and moral teachings of its supposed founder, considered in an impartial spirit, were undoubtedly a slight improvement upon prevailing ideals and sentiments.

Not that the early Christians manifested any determined disposition to carry out the higher teachings of their master. Like their modern brethren, their preaching was a great deal better than their practice. Dr. Janes, in his admirable work, "A Study of Primitiv Christianity" (p. 277), says:

> Evidently the distinguishing characteristics of the growing faith were not those of notable moral superiority. The careful student of this period can hardly fail to confirm the conclusion of Dr. Hedge that the primitiv church did not aim primarily at good behavior. "Had this been the end," he declares, "there would hav been a rapid and marked improvement in the morals of society. But no such improvement appears."

The admonitions of Paul and of the fathers prove, on the contrary, that the worst of social conditions were not uncommon within the bosom of Christian communities. That feature in the teaching of Jesus and his apostles which avoided conflict with the constituted authorities by inculcating the doctrin of non-resistance; which regarded a temporary submission to social injustices as preferable to activ protest and forceful opposition, in view of the speedy destruction of the existing order of the world, lent itself readily to the methods of designing theologians and retarded the practical application of the principles of the gospels in the reorganization of society.

Two important teachings of Jesus, however, seemed to hav taken possession of the minds of the early Christians, viz.: The doctrin of the equality of all men in the sight of God, which may be taken as the foundation of Christian Socialism, and the approaching end of the world.

That Jesus was a Communist in the complete sense of the term there can be but little doubt. He taught that the rich should sell all that they possessed and giv to the poor; that poverty was a blessing (Luke vi, 21); and that the possession of riches in this life was a decided impediment in the road to happiness hereafter (Markx, 25). Indeed, he made it quite clear that Christians ought to share all they had with their friends and neighbors, especially with preachers like himself and his appointed disciples. No doubt this Socialistic or Communistic doctrin produced a marked effect upon the poorer members of the community and gave to early Christianity a great impetus. A struggling mass of people, dissatisfied with the conditions of life under which they were living, would grasp at the first nostrum presented to them which gave the promis of future improvement. Consequently, the masses, the poor, weak, ignorant, ragged mob, saw in the new teaching the hope of future salvation in this world; and it was this belief, held with touching tenacity and promulgated with ferocious earnestness, which carried them through troublous times to a final triumph.

Add to this their belief in the approaching end of the world and the establishment of the kingdom of heaven upon a new and regenerated earth (Matt. xxiv, 29, 30), and it will be easy to understand the enthusiastic and defiant spirit of these early followers of the carpenter of Nazareth.

This spirit led them into all kinds of extravagant conduct; so that the earliest references we hav concerning them from authentic sources lead to the conclusion that they were an ignorant and noisy set of persons bent on any kind of mischief that would call the attention of the authorities to them (see Gibbon's "Decline and Fall").

Between the time of Marcus Aurelius Antoninus (date 121 to 180) and the reign of Constantine the Christians suffered much from persecution, but so strong was the Socialistic faith within them that persecution only served to make them stronger in numbers and in the tenacious character of their belief. In time Christians made themselvs felt as a political force, and then it was that as an organization Christianity became a recognized power in the state. But even then the wielders of imperial power did not regard the new faith from a religious or moral standpoint—they merely looked upon it as a secular organization that was making its way, and which was to be counted upon in future political action.

That all the Roman emperors did not consider Christianity to be a true religion which was destined to supersede paganism, must be seen in the fact that Marcus Aurelius and Julian each in turn rejected the new faith, which they regarded in the light of a crass and mischievous superstition.

The triumph of Christianity as a political organization was brought about in the following fashion: The predecessor of Constantine, one Maximin, it appears, was a man of vicious habits and tyrannical character. All forms of belief with which he had the slightest disagreement he looked upon as highly dangerous to the state and as such deserving of no better fate than that of being stamped out of existence by the iron heels of tyranny and persecution.

Consequently he persecuted the Christians with consistent cruelty and vindictivness; prohibited them from meeting in the cemeteries and catacombs, confiscated their property, waged war against the state of Armenia, and sought to finish the work of destruction by an attempt to remodel paganism to meet the requirements of the age. Toward the close of his unworthy career the emperor appears to hav repented of his harsh and cruel conduct, and, like most persons of vacillating character, he went to the other extreme, and issued an edict of toleration and recommended the pagans in future to giv the Christians every consideration—to treat them kindly and to adopt as many as possible of their principles. He also issued an edict commanding the restoration of their confiscated property, and wound up by demanding for the Christian the fullest liberty of conscience. All this may be taken as an indication that the Christians were making their influence felt as a political force to such a degree as to be perfectly irresistible.

When Constantine became emperor he extended the policy of his predecessor, and made Christianity the religion of the state. Rome was practically on the verge of dissolution when Constantine began to reign, and it only needed a bold political leader to pronounce in favor of Christianity to at once put it in the place of honor. This Constantine speedily did. An ambitious man, with a strong will to carry into effect his every desire, he stooped at nothing to gratify his lust of power. Consequently we find that his conduct was infamous, even when it did not involve the sacrifice of innocent lives. But it often did involve the shedding of innocent blood, and among his numerous victims he sacrificed his own flesh and blood as well as that of the stranger—"his father-in-law, his brother-in-law, Licinius, his own son, Crispus, his nephew, the son of Licinius, a boy eleven years old, and lastly his wife, Fausta." And this man, this cruel, heartless murderer, was the man who did more to make Christianity a great power in the world than any other person before or since. Think of it, good Christians! Ponder it!!! The subsequent growth of the Christian tree depended very largely upon being planted firmly in the bed of the Roman state and tended and watered by official sanction. There is this, however, to be said on behalf of Constantine—he not only made Christianity the state religion, but founded a number of Christian churches in Rome, each of which he supported from the public revenue. In his nature were exemplified the qualities of that eccentric class of men who endow a dozen or a score of religions to make sure they hav got the right one. Even after the establishment of Christianity as the state religion the worship of Cybele continued as late as the fifth century. So that in taking on the new love Constantine did not altogether abandon the old. It was while Constantine was emperor that December 25th was set apart as the birthday of Jesus; and Sunday, the first day of the week, became the recognized day of rest and worship—in fact, the holy day. Once allied to the state, Christianity, as an organized system, began to spread and to prosper. But ever and anon bitter feuds arose between various sects, and each in turn persecuted and maltreated the other. About this period the great theological conflict known as the Arian controversy reached its full hight, and a formal proclamation was made concerning the nature of Christ and his relationship to God. Fierce and bitter was this controversy while it lasted. One school of theologians maintained that the Father and the Son were eternal and co-equal, and that the Holy Ghost, though he (she or it) proceeded from the Father and the Son, was of the same age and co-equal with the others aforenamed. But Arius affirmed that there was a time when the Father alone existed; and that, although the Son was in existence before the world, the Father existed alone before time began. And the question was finally settled by the Council of Nice, and is now embodied in the orthodox creed

On Prayer.

Will any one of the ninety thousand clergymen of the United States tell me what benefit there is in prayer? Will they tell me when any prayer was ever answered? Tell me what the prayer was for and all about it. I hav lived more than ninety years and hav seen hundreds of men who thought it their duty to kneel and pray every night and morning, and again to ask a blessing at every meal, but never knew a single one of all these prayers to be answered. We read that Christ, when in the garden with his disciples, left them, and went alone and prayed saying, "Oh my Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from me; nevertheless not as I will but as thou wilt." He then returned to his disciples, but after a little while he went away again and repeated the same prayer and returned again to his disciples, but after a little time went and prayed the third time, repeating the same words.

It is understood that by this cup he meant his crucifixion, and he was praying not to be crucified. Now, if the Father and Son were one, how could they hav two wills? If they were one, as the Bible says they are, how could the Father hav a will to crucify his son while the son had a will not to be crucified? Here is one of the many plain contradictions of the Bible! The Bible says God is supreme in power, wisdom, mercy, and love. If so, why could not God hav forgiven the sins of men and exercised his mercy and love by sparing his son instead of pouring out his wrath and vengeance on the innocent? Even the prayer of Christ was not answered, though uttered in agony three times over! And then, when on the cross, his whole weight hanging on the nails through his hands and feet and the blood flowing from his side, in terrible agony he cried out, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" And not one word did he receive in reply! Could anything be more devilish than that? If there is a being worthy to called God it is impossible for man to tell a greater lie about him. No such being would torture the innocent that way for the sins of the guilty.

If this story about Christ's prayers and crucifixion is true, it contradicts many other passages of scripture and proves that Christ was a man and not at one with God.

The Bible says, "If ye hav faith as a grain of mustard seed ye shall say unto this mountain, Be thou removed and be thou cast into the sea, and it shall be done." The ninety thousand clergymen in this country profess to believe that the Bible was inspired by a supreme being, and a friend has authorized me to offer the ninety thousand $500 if all of them praying together will remove a dead fly or a thimbleful of dirt one inch on my table at any time that they may appoint, the money to be paid immediately on condition that one-half of it be divided equally among the mothers of illegitimate children born to American clergymen during the first year after their prayers hav performed the miracle. Now, reverend gentlemen, if your Bible doctrin about prayer is true, you hav an opportunity to prove it and doubtless to benefit quite a number of mothers that may be found weeping over unwelcome children. In ninety years of careful observation I hav never known a prayer to be answered.

Sunday Laws.

The following article is from the editorial columns of the Christian Statesman, published at Philadelphia, Pa., June 25 1891:

The American Sentinel quotes with approbation the language of the secretary of the Washington Secular Union in arguing against our Sabbath laws: "Workingmen need to sleep at night. Shall we hav a civil law decreeing under a penalty of fine and imprisonment, what time all shall go to sleep? Shall we hav an act of the council compelling all persons to eat between the hours of twelve and one? If the people of the United States do not know enough to rest on Sunday, or any other day when they need rest, it is certain they much more require a law to send them to bed at night."

This reasoning is valid against those who would take our Sabbath laws exclusivly on physiological or economic considerations, but the National Reform Association has not made this mistake. While appreciating the value of the argument from nature it has always held that the only ultimate foundation for the law of God, which has reserved one-seventh of man's time from secular uses, has made the right to rest during that portion of time, one of the chiefest human rights, and made the obligation of rest as binding on states and nations as on individuals.

That the sole object of Sunday laws is to enforce religious observance of the day has been before admitted by the leading Sunday law advocates.

Rev. Wilbur Crafts declared, "Taking religion out of the day, takes the rest out."

Dr. Joe Cook, lecturing on Sunday laws, said, "The experience of centuries shows, however, that you will in vain endeavor to preserve Sunday as a day of rest unless you preserve it as a day of worship. Unless Sabbath observance be founded upon religious reasons you will not long maintain it."

It being admitted that Sunday is a religious institution, any legislation, national, state, county, or municipal, in regard to its observance must be unconstitutional.

How men should conduct themselvs toward their fellow-men, it is for civil government to decide; that is the very purpose of its existence; but as regards our duty toward God, no civil government can of right hav anything to do; that rests solely between man and his God.

Civil government has nothing to do with what we owe to God, or whether we owe him anything or not, or whether, if we do owe him anything, we pay it or not.

George Washington said: "Every man who conducts himself as a good citizen is accountable alone to God for his religious faith, and is to be protected in worshiping God according to the dictates of his own conscience."

Our national Constitution provides that the civil government shall hav nothing to do with religion, or what pertains to God; but shall leave that to every man's conscience and his God. As long as he is a good citizen the civil government must protect him and leave him perfectly free to worship whom he pleases, when he pleases, as he pleases, or not at all if he pleases.

In 1796 in the treaty made with Tripoli, General Washington declared, "The Government of the United States of America is not in any sense founded on the Christian religion."

The very first amendment to the Constitution of the United States was adopted by the first Congress in 1798, "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof."

The state constitution of Washington, Art. I, sec. 11, reads: "Absolute freedom of conscience in all matters of religious sentiment, belief, and worship shall be guaranteed to every individual, and no one shall be molested or disturbed in person or property on account of religion."

The plea heretofore insisted on, and the sophism with which some judges hav sought to justify their perversion of right, justice, and the sacred provisions of the Constitution, has been: the enforced Sunday observance was not a religious but a civil law. Sunday advocates declare they do not desire a law to enforce religious observance of the day, but a civil law, a sanitary ordinance, their interest not being for the upholding a religious observance, but a loving desire to provide rest for the poor dear wage-workers.

Now the chief organ of the God-in-the-Constitution and the Sabbath Union fanatics, representing the majority of the Protestant ministers and their churches, admits the truth, that it is not a civil enactment they are working for, but a law to compel religious observance of Sunday.

Religious zeal enlists the strongest prejudices of the human mind; and when misdirected under the delusiv pretext of doing God service, excites the worst passions of our nature. When man undertakes to become God's avenger he becomes a demon. Driven by the frenzy of a religious zeal, he loses every gentle feeling, forgets every claim alike of justice, mercy, and humanity, and becomes ferocious and unrelenting.

If there is a day which the almighty desires should be exclusivly devoted to his worship—and remember, the proof both biblical and historical is that Saturday, the seventh, and not Sunday, the first, is that day—would it not be better to rely on his almighty power than on the arm of the law?

A Great, Big Time.

When the words, "A Great, Big Time," are written by a Portsmouth Secularist, descriptiv of a Freethought meeting or Liberal lecture course, you are safe in wagering your last article of value that Rome has howled just once again.

Our first "big time" was when the fourteenth congress pursued its mission in our midst. This was last November. Our second "big time" began last Saturday night, and finished with the midnight hours of Tuesday. Its dimensions did not equal those of the congress, but it was a "big time," all the same. A free lecture-course we had; Samuel P. Putnam was the speaker, and the Grand Opera House the place. His lectures were able and profound. His best efforts were those of the opening and closing nights respectivly, the subject of the former being "The Demands of Liberalism," and that of the latter, "The Religious Conspiracy." This last it seemed to me was his masterpiece. His whole soul was in its delivery. Grandly, magnificently he presented it, showing the position of the Catholic church and its allies in the politics of to-day. His tribute to our flag and our country's Constitution was a wonderful piece of acting, stirring the patriotism and winning the admiration of his hearers. In short, all his talks were an unfolding of magnetic oratory, adorned by strong, convincing words.

The distinguished gentleman was with us four days and five nights. He came within our gates last Friday night, when he was met by a committee of citizens, royally received, and then driven to the Biggs's, his headquarters during his stay. The drawing cards to his lectures were open-air concerts by the River City band, under the leadership of Prof. George Kah; sweet singing by Magnolia Quartet, composed of Messrs. Shunake, Woods, Haley, and Justice; and piano music by Miss Sarah Stevens. Of the open-air concerts it can be said, they equaled those of traveling professional bands. The music they gave was of that catchy character that thrills the frame of man and sets his feet to patting. To this band we tip our hat and offer up—not a prayer—but three rousers and a tiger.

Magnolia Quartet did well. They always do. They are natural-born singers, and make notes, sweetly entrancing, do their bidding.

The piano selections by Miss Stevens were exceedingly fine. Her pretty touching of the ivory keys brought forth that which makes of earth a paradise—the best and choicest music.

By way of advertising we were granted space in the local columns of all our city papers, both before and after the lecture. The sidewalks and street crossings were chalked in big and glaring letters thus: "Putnam at the Grand," "Putnam's Free Lecture, July 11, 12, 13, and 14; Free!" and other similar phrases; and dodgers reading thus as appended were scattered throughout the city:

FREE LECTURES!
At the Grand Opera House,
Commencing Saturday, July 11th, and continuing Sunday, Monday, and Tuesday nights.
Hon. Samuel P. Putnam, Humanity's Friend, the speaker.
Open-air concerts by River City band.
Sweet singing by Magnolia Quartet—Shunake, Woods, Haley, and Justice.
And other musical attractions.
Everybody invited. Admission Free.

At the wind-up of the lecture course I presented the following, which was adopted, and ordered inscribed on our minutes and published in Secular papers:

The ability and the genius of Samuel P. Putnam shine out across the Secular world like "stars of the morning." His efforts on behalf of intellectual liberty are felt and recognized by the masses of our land. This and more his visit reiterates and acclaims. Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Portsmouth Secular Union extends its unanimous appreciation of the gentleman named; and further, that to him we giv our thanks and cheers, and our best and choicest wishes.

Thus closed the visit of Samuel P. Putnam to old Portsmouth. True, it was his first, but it shall not be his last. We like him. He is, as Ingersoll says, "a person who compels the admiration of all who love the just and the true." WILL S. ANDRES.

The Way to Tax the Churches.

There are Nine Demands the Liberals of the land demand, and hav long so done, and as yet got none of them, and unless they take some more effectiv step they never will. One—and the most important one—is, equal taxation of all property, and no privileged exemption of any sort or persons. The question is, How can we accomplish this reform? We cannot expect to get all of our desired reforms in a lump and at one time. We are to get them one at a time; and taxation of churches and clergymen is one of the most important of them all, and is the most obtainable of all, for nearly all people would be glad to hav all such exempted property brought under the ban of taxation. Now, the way to proceed to obtain a law for taxing all such exempted property is to commence in our primary political meetings, commencing with our caucus gatherings, putting in nomination persons for legislatures pledged to use all honorable means in their power to procure a state law taxing all property alike. But few would object to such a movement, and these few would object from selfishness more than from justice. If the common people, the ones who suffer the injustice of our present taxation laws, will use the power that is in their hands, and nominate persons who will use their efforts for so desirable an end, relief will soon be had.

Ministers, and that class of people they so easily control, are ever watchful and ready to obtain legislativ favors, and when they cannot get them openly, they get them on the sly, as in the case of their Sabbath law, which is, "If a man is seen carrying in hand a fish-pole on the Sabbath, or a gun on the Sabbath, it is prima facie evidence he is violating a Sabbath law and must be punished."

I hope THE TRUTH SEEKER and all other good papers will agitate this subject of putting in nomination to compose our next state Assembly persons instructed to obtain a law that will afford relief from this unfair exemption in taxation.

This thing ought to hav been resorted to long ago, and then the evil so long complained of would not now be in existence. Think of this thing, ye overburdened tax-payers—like Sinbad, in the tale of the "Nights," who carried the old man on his shoulders and did not know enough to throw him off. Let every man pay his own debts, his own interest, and his own taxes, and not depend on others.

The Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence a Myth.

In the Open Court of July 21 Mr. Conway has an article on the Declaration of Independence from which I extract the following:

From the county of Mecklenburg, N. C., came resolutions passed May 31 and June 10, 1775, demanding the organization of an independent government. Congress would not allow such treasonable resolutions to be read before it, and the written records were lost. Jefferson pronounced the Mecklenburg resolutions mythical. But lately a copy of the South Carolina Gazette of June 13, 1775, has been discovered containing the resolutions. It is in Charleston, and I hav seen a photograph copy.

Mr. Conway is mistaken in saying that "the written records were lost." Not only did some of them appear in Northern newspapers, but he will find them entire in Wheeler's "History of North Carolina," published in 1851; and they are extracted from the South Carolina Gazette and County Journal of June, 1775.

It is misleading to say that "Jefferson pronounced the Mecklenburg resolutions mythical." In 1819 John Adams transmitted to Jefferson a copy of four resolutions purporting to hav been adopted at Charlotte, N. C., May 20, 1775, which strikingly paralleled with the Declaration of Independence. Jefferson had never before heard of them, and pronounced them spurious. To hav admitted their genuinness would hav convicted himself of plagiarism. Even John Adams was not long in discrediting them.

But neither Adams nor Jefferson was aware (or possibly may hav forgotten) that there was a meeting at Charlotte, N. C., May 31, 1875, which passed not those four but twenty other resolutions of a revolutionary character, though falling short of a declaration of independence, and containing no expressions paralleling the Declaration of July 4, 1776.

Those twenty resolutions were transmitted to England by Governor Wright of Georgia, June 20, 1775, and by Governor Martin of North Carolina, June 30, 1775. I quote part of Governor Martin's letter to the secretary of state, London:

The resolves of the committee of Mecklenburg, which your lordship will find in the inclosed newspaper, surpass all the horrid and treasonable publications that the inflammatory spirits of the continent hav yet produced. . . . A copy of these resolves, I am informed, were sent off, by express, to the Congress at Philadelphia, as soon as they were passed in the committee.

For a few years past the people of North Carolina hav been celebrating the so-called Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence of May 20, 1775. The date is wrong by eleven days. Old style is said to hav been followed in that colony, so that May 20th was actually May 31st new style. Nor did that meeting pass any resolution like the following:

Resolved, That we do hereby declare ourselvs a free and independent people, and of right ought to be a sovereign and self-governing association, under the control of no power other than that of our God and the general government of the Congress, to the maintenance of which independence we solemnly pledge to each other our lives, our fortunes, and our most sacred honor.

This was one of the four fabricated resolutions first published in 1819, which dumfounded Adams, and, if genuin, would hav proved Jefferson a plagiarist. The people of Mecklenburg county did rebel and did form an independent local government; and thus resolved to continue that self-government "until instructions from the Provincial Congress regulating the jurisprudence of the province shall provide otherwise, or the legislativ body of Great Britain resign its unjust and arbitrary pretensions with respect to America."

It was a bona fide local rebellion in Mecklenburg county, but there is no language in the twenty resolutions of May 31, 1775, which parallels with the Declaration of Independence of July 4, 1776; and had Jefferson in 1819 been aware of the existence of those genuin resolutions he would not hav discredited them. It was the fabricated resolutions that he pronounced mythical. W. H. BURR.

The A and Z of Money.

All that money can do is to pay the difference arising from the exchange of things. It was born of debt, and no matter whether we use metal or paper signs they represent credit (confidence or trust) in circulation. Withdraw our confidence in gold and it is worthless; place that confidence in beads and they do all the work of money.

Why hav governments generally been the issuers of the money signs? Simply because they are the largest creditors of and debtors to their people, drawing from them the revenues and paying the revenues out to their servitors and contractors. Therefore the executivs stamped their effigies on the pieces of money to indicate they would be received back in payment of taxes.

As governments are merely agents, we may say that the servitors and contractors owe services and commodities to people and people owe back to the servitors the like things. When the service is rendered the money tokens are given in evidence thereof, and receivers deliver them back to people for things they require. Now, if any company of men were doing business and had within themselvs all the things their employees want, you would not find them going about to dig gold at the cost of a dollar for a hundred cents' worth, or borrowing bills of other men to settle so simple a transaction. Any simple cheap sign would suffice. In fact, our banks use the clearing-house to settle their vast transactions. And but for their interference people (i. e., government) would do likewise. Every dollar bill issued goes first to servitors, contractors, pensioners, etc., who call on people for commodities, etc., and from the people it goes right into their treasury in payment of revenue. Some $3,000,000 per day are thus put into circulation. But we either buy gold or borrow bills, and burden our currency with this useless cost for the people to pay.

One word more. As money is not the thing used, which thing is its representativ, we violate the very law of its being by declaring any rare precious metal to be the money. This enables a few to monopolize all money. But nature asserts herself against our statutes, because, from ninety-four to ninety-eight per cent of all money signs are of paper supposed to be based on somebody's gold or silver. So when panic comes, as it must often do under such abominable misregulation, the whole ninety-four or ninety-eight per cent stands for redemption by the six or two per cent of metal as the case may be.

Can anyone deny the facts and principles herein laid down?

Come on with the old sneer about cheap money and over-issues, as though cheapness were evil, as though over-issues of paper were worse or different from over-issues of gold or silver. Declare the real money to be the only lawful money and one dollar paper will always equal one hundred cents.

HOLT.

Is Immortality Being Demonstrated?

We think it may be conceded as a fact, that the majority of this world of humanity hope for immortality or a continuation of existence after death; and it is only among the learned logicians that the subject becomes a matter of doubt. This latter condition of thought has the logic of the schools to support its skepticism, and when through simple Spiritualism its advocates attempt to enforce proof leading to conviction, these learned savants scornfully reject its evidence with a pooh, pooh.

It was on the death of the writer's wife in the year 1832 that his attention was forced seriously to reflect on immortality. That an intelligent and beloved companion should in one short minute be a rational, conversable being, and in the next a speechless corpse!

As the Bible and New Testament throw no light on this ambiguous subject, the writer had, like the rest of humanity, to wait for the developments taking place at Hydesville by the Fox family, that an intercourse could be obtained through spirit rappings and other manifestations. It was found at Hydesville, after numerous trials, that spirits could rap out their sentiments by responding to the call of the alphabet. From this time forward the work was done.

Although the Jewish Bible throws no light on the subject of Spiritualism, there are yet abundant accounts to show that under the head of witchcraft their invisible friends tried various crude ways to get themselvs recognized by mortals.

In the second book of Moses, called Exodus, verse 13, chapter xxiii, it is commanded, "Thou shalt not suffer a witch to liv." This command is found intermixed with instructions to the then dominant priesthood. Under the head of witchcraft, one can easily imagin every species of performance, orgie, and mysterious incantation now better understood under the more modern titles of animal magnetism, mesmerism, impressible psychology, hypnotism, and lastly, Spiritualism.

I think the word witchcraft occurs thirteen times in the Hebrew Bible. Saul, the first king of the Jews, was anointed to fill that office by the high priest Samuel, and he was particularly severe on the practice of witchcraft, seeming to dread its disturbing influence; for he declared death to anyone having a familiar spirit (probably now recognized as a clairvoyant).

And yet, bad as was King Saul's opinion of witchcraft, he could not but acknowledge its truth and efficacy; for in his desperation, when the priesthood and the people went against him, he, in disguise with a few followers, sought out the woman at Endor to obtain advice; and she, at the risk of her life, raised the spirit of Samuel, who truthfully told his fate, that to-morrow the battle would go against him and he and his two sons would be slain.

We seem to be awakening now in this age to a recognition of another and more refined realm of existence after death. Principles ever remain the same, and it is little wonder that like principles in their operation should produce like effects. The well-organized, comfortable priesthood of to-day are a far-sighted set of tradesmen; and when the time arrives when religion is not based as now, on ignorance and pretense, but on the scientific contemplation of facts, there will be less charlatanism, less superficial ostentation and reilgious parade, but true scientific piety. DAVID BRUCE.

Some Soul Questions Answered.

On pages 237 and 238 of W. S. Bell's "Hand Book of Freethought," I find a series of twenty-five soul questions which I propose to answer, believing that I can answer the most of them correctly.

1. Where does the soul come from? Ans. It is everywhere and can come from anywhere.

2. Is the soul an entity or non-entity? Ans. An entity.

3. Of what is the soul composed? Ans. Electricity.

4. When does the soul enter the body, before or after birth? Ans. Before birth it enters the fetus with the blood through the umbilicus. After birth it enters with every bite of food, with every drink of water, and with every inspiration of air.

5. In what part of the body is the soul? Ans. In all parts of it.

6. If the soul is in all parts of the body, what becomes of that part of the soul contained in an amputated part of a living body? Ans. It goes with the amputated part, but ceases to animate it, because its supply of constructiv material is cut off; it then acts destructivly upon the amputated part.

7. Is the soul an organization independent of the body? Ans. No.

8. Does the soul develop as the body develops? Ans. As every material molecule has its quantum of soul associated with it, the strength and quantity of the individual soul increases with the body, and vice versa.

9. Is the soul of an infant of the same size and weight as the soul of an adult? Ans. It has no weight; it is imponderable.

10. Is the soul of a negro of the same color as the soul of a Caucasian? Ans. It has no color, it is invisible.

11. Is the soul of an idiot as well developed as the soul of an intelligent person? Ans. Its material battery is defectiv and it works imperfectly.

12. When does the soul leave the body . . . ? Ans. It is all the time leaving the body with the exhalations, perspirations, and excrements. When the body dies its quantum of soul remains with it and acts destructivly upon it, instead of constructivly.

14 If a living person was placed in an air-tight jar sealed hermetically at death, how would the soul make its exit? Ans. If the jar was glass, a non-conducting material, it could not make its exit.

17. Where and at what distance from the earth is the soul land located? Ans. The earth is just as much a soul land as any other land?

21. Of what shape is the soul? Ans. It has no shape. It flows in circuits in and around material bodies.

22 Of what color is the soul? It has no color.

23. Does the soul retain its sex? Ans. What is called positiv and negativ electricity are the sexes of soul, and they were married and became one before we got acquainted with them, and we cannot divorce them.

24. When and where are the souls made, or did they always exist? Ans. No one can answer that question. Soul existed before men began to write history. The souls of men are only made in the sense that a drop of water is made in the cloud or a drop of dew on a grass blade.

25. We hav five infallible witnesses to prove the existence of matter, namely, hearing, seeing, tasting, smelling, and feeling. By these five witnesses we prove the existence and component parts of matter. Can you by the aid of these five senses prove the existence of souls? Ans. By the aid of these five senses we can prove that there is a difference between a live man and a dead one. The dead man has all the material in him that the live man has, yet he lacks the five senses, because the soul has gone to sleep. We can see lightning and hear thunder, but we cannot see the agent or force which produces it. We can see material bodies attract and repel each other, but we cannot discover by our senses the thing that makes them do it. We can change their attraction and repulsion without adding material to them or taking it from them. If we touch any material body which is more highly charged with electricity than our bodies, i.e., has more than its quantum of soul, we experience a change of feeling, yet we can not see, hear, taste, smell, weigh, or measure the thing which produced that sensation.

I find some quotations from Prof. John Tyndall on pages 232–233 of this "Hand Book," which show that Professor Tyndall had the cart a-pulling the horse. He had matter the force governing mind. If I were to say that I regarded brick as the power by which houses were built, the people would either dub me as a crank, or would think that I did not understand the use of language and had made it say something which I did not mean. P. F. SHUMAKER.

Flat Creek, La., June 22, 291.

P. S.—Prof. John Tyndall was a Materialist, and had exalted ideas of matter. Some authorities define the word matter in such a manner as to make it cover the universe. Webster's "Practical Dictionary," in defining matter, says: "Subject of thought, emotion, speech, or action." Now, this is trying to drive deity and soul entirely out of the field. I make a distinction and divide the universe into two entities, electricity [spirit] and matter. Matter is ponderable, electricity is not. The phenomena of chemistry indicate that matter consists of indissoluble and indestructible atoms. There are no phenomena indicating that electricity is composed of atoms.

It is said that Dr. Franklin bottled electricity and corked it up. If this be true, it seems to me that electricity was disassociated with matter. P. F. S.

Parochial School Disciplin.

From the Antigo, Wisconsin, Republican.

The most shocking and horrible spectacle of human brutality imaginable was brought to our attention Monday. F. Wege and wife came into our office immediately after dinner, having with them two bright-looking little girls, one nine and the other eleven years of age. They asked us to look at the hands, wrists, and arms of the two little girls. We did, and found them to be veritable puff-balls. The little palms were as swollen as the skin would permit, and the fingers were like inflated bladders. Black and blue spots and open cuts were noticeable all over the hands and wrists. We asked the cause of such plight, and this is what the parents told us:

"The little girls hav been attending the Catholic parochial school. One week ago we took them to the matinee of 'Little Lord Fontleroy,' given by the Noble Brothers. They were told by the sisters who are in charge of the school, not to attend; in case they did they would be punished. We kept them home one week, and when they returned to school this morning they were whipped with rawhides, with the result you see. Besides, the little girls were told if they said anything to us about the whipping they would be punished more severely, if they (the teachers) found it out."

We asked if the little girls told the teachers that they had the consent of their parents to go to the show.

"Yes," was the answer, "and the teachers said that made no difference, they must do as they told them, and not as their parents said."

The parents said if the little girls had wished to keep the fact of the whipping a secret, they could not hav done it, because their hands were so badly lacerated that they could not handle the knives and forks at the dinner table.

They were thoroughly aroused over the inhumanity of the teachers and said they would see if there were not some way to punish them in the courts. They said they had all the experience of the parochial schools they wanted. Hereafter their children would attend the public school.

Tuesday a warrant was issued by Judge Finucane against Sister Luidgardes for whipping the children. She was brought into court, and the case was continued until the return of Father Takken, who was absent from the city.

How powerful is the empire of words when they hav once been received. The multitude seize upon words which fill all mouths even in the midst of facts the most contrary.—Napoleon Bonaparte.

Why I Cannot Be a Christian.—Concluded.

In these latter days the priest vehemently asserts that all improvements in the condition of mankind are due to the Christian religion. But the fact is, retrogression in everything that belongs to liberty and progress took place during centuries of Dark Ages under Christian domination, and proves the assumption false. Man is now progressing in spite of a croaking, threatening priesthood.

Many of the historical asseverations in the gospels cannot be true. A monk in his cloister, where no light of the natural world can enter, is ever ready to invent a circumstance that may add support to his particular theory. Hence, we hav the story of the immaculate conception in one place, and the claim that Joseph is the father of Jesus in another. Thus we hav the story of the "holy family" fleeing into Egypt, not so much to escape the sword of Herod as "that the scripture might be fulfilled." Thus we hav many other ridiculous things done "that the scripture might be fulfilled." And thus we hav the stories that the earth was darkened for three hours at the time of the crucifixion; that the earth did quake; that the graves were opened and many bodies of the saints came out of the graves and appeared unto many, etc.

Now, Judea was the particular spot on this earth where all these marvels are said to hav taken place, and this spot was governed at that time by authority of the Roman empire. Had these wonders of the gospels actually occurred, surely such historians and poets as Philo, Pliny, and Josephus, all of whom flourished about the time, must hav heard something of them. Strange that these learned men wrote nothing about such momentous events, while later on the Christian monk saw how each tale would round out his theory and "fulfill the scripture." Herod was amenable to Rome, and Rome was tolerant of all religions. He could not hav slaughtered the infants of Bethlehem without being impeached. Yet, notwithstanding the lamentations of the mothers, none save the writers of the gospels ever knew of this terrible method of fulfilling scripture. According to this story, instead of Jesus dying for the sake of others, these children died for his sake. Such grossly manufactured testimony is tolerated only in theology.

The quotations in the New Testament from the Old, such as "He shall be called a Nazarene," "They parted my raiment among them, and for my vesture they did cast lots," "A bone of him shall not be broken," etc., "That the scripture might be fulfilled," in their original import furnish no ground for the attempt to make Jesus or any other man a God.

While Jesus lived no one, not even his apostles, thought him a God; and to this day his own countrymen, save a mere handful, scout the idea that ever a Jew was born a God. The story of his immaculate conception was an afterthought and does not stand alone. The conception of his cousin John the Baptist was brought about by the same accommodating angel in the same manner; and the Buddhists believe that Buddha had a like supernatural conception.

This globe on which we dwell is only one of myriads circling in the heavens, and the priests tell us that the almighty creator of all these worlds gathered himself up in the similitude of a Jew, suffered hunger and stripes at the hands of his own creatures, and, with the weight of the sins of the world crushing him in supernatural agony, died an ignominious death on a cross. How can we respect the great ruler of all things and believe such absurd stuff?

Fourth: Some conclusions.

Never yet was progress made in truth and liberty of thought but through Infidelity to existing orthodoxy. Conservativ orthodoxy would keep the world in perpetual bondage, but Infidelity forces it to shift its position. Jesus was an Infidel. He denounced the priests and rich monopolists, prophesied the elevation of the poor, and suffered martyrdom for his Infidelity to the then prevailing orthodoxy.

The teachings of Jesus were welcomed by the poor far and wide in the Roman empire, and the sagacious Constantine, by adopting the cross for his banner, made himself emperor.

On the breaking up of the Roman empire, which began soon after, Christianity had become so strong that its church established an orthodoxy more intolerant than ever; and for a thousand years thereafter this church held the mind of man in bondage, not allowing an Infidel to breathe the fresh air of heaven. This church destroyed or prohibited everything not consistent with its supernatural dogmas. Scarcely a discovery was made in astronomy, in natural history, or in physical science that did not meet with condemnation and persecution at the hands of ignorant, bigoted Christians. Even Newton was accused of "dethroning the deity." The knowledge of the world was nearly obliterated. The sun of human progress was forced to set in a long night of Dark Ages, and the fearful torch of hell was the substitute. The Dark Ages indisputably were the result of church power and intolerance. It was not till the fourteenth century that, owing to comparativ laxity of church supervision, men began again to think, to write, to publish; and heresy and Infidelity grew apace. The Reformation soon followed; and in the contest between an "infallible church" and those who claimed the right to differ with it, millions of lives hav been sacrificed. In the collision the old church was rent in pieces; and each one of the pieces now claims, in face of all history, that the Christian church has been at all times the special promoter and supporter of liberty and progress. No claim could be more false. The philosopher, scientist, and heretic are not now tortured in prison or roasted alive, for the divided church has lost its former power. But the fragments of the once universal church are now itching for more influence and control, and already there are symptoms of a growing disposition to again unite; already Protestant and Catholic priests shake hands on the same platform. Woe be to man when the different sects unite their forces to again stifle intellectual progress. The battle for liberty will then hav to be fought again.

Exercising the right to examin and reject the supernatural dogmas of a superannuated church is good Infidelity. The success of the Revolution of 1776 was due largely to Infidelity. The dogmas of the divine right of kings and the duty to "obey the powers that be," as taught by the church, were ignored by the patriots. Many prominent men of that day were Infidels. Washington declares, in a letter to a friend, "The government of the United States is not in any sense founded on the Christian religion."

To day the fact is self-evident that liberty and progress advance in line with Infidelity to the supernatural dogmas of the church. In England and the United States, where these benefits are enjoyed in the greatest degree, do we find the most Infidelity; while in nations where a united church retains the mastery ecclesiastic slavery still exists. It is also true that in the highest intellectual centers we find the most positiv Infidelity.

And this Infidelity is now influential enough throughout a large portion of Christendom to prevent the use of dungeon and thumbscrew for heresy. It has compelled the priest to preach love and mercy. He no longer dares in dramatic action to suspend by a single hair the struggling infant over a yawning gulf of fire to frighten sympathetic mothers and timid children into becoming profitable Christians. He formerly declared morality and man's good works to be but "filthy rags." He now advocates morality and right living. He is shifting his base of orthodoxy to less offensiv ground, and Infidelity is the activ cause.

Nations rose and fell before the Christian era, and they hav risen and fallen since. But some law independent of Christianity has governed the process. Ancient Egypt, with her wonderful architecture based on astronomic knowledge, and Phœnicia, with her "lost arts" which are as yet scarcely recovered, had been despoiled by the conqueror. Christianity was thinly planted on their ruins, but it did not resuscitate them. Greece, possessing the only language adapted to science and philosophy, with her sculptors, poets, and orators who are the envy of the modern student, was in a state of decline when Paul preached at Athens, and in spite of gospel preaching she continued to decline. Rome was at her zenith of power and grandeur at the beginning of the Christian era. As Christianity gradually rose, the empire gradually fell; and at last, in the fifth century, state and church joined hands, and entered the Dark Age, where they remained in embrace for a thousand years.

All the characteristics of greatness and prosperity of Greece and Rome were antecedent to the Christian era. And the frequent claim of the priest that to Christianity is due all the progress in civilization and culture is, I repeat, the champion falsehood.

Christianity was preached with considerable success throughout western Asia and northern Africa for five hundred years, after which Mohammedanism took its place changing the worship to Allah and his prophet. Two-thirds of the Christian area at the time was lost. Surely, were Christianity the divine thing it is claimed to be, its divine founder would take better care of it.

Mankind pegged away on this earth many thousands of years without Christianity. Strange that such a "pearl beyond price" should hav been withheld so long, and doled out now only to the few elect. But it is not one of the necessaries of life. Great and good men hav lived without it. The house of a Christian is just as likely to be struck by lightning as one built by an Infidel. The evidence is all around us that a belief in the divinity of Jesus does not necessarily make a man wise and honest; neither does such a belief make him forgiving, for as a rule he admires the idea of an eternal hell for those who differ with him. According to his sense of honor and right, not to his dogmatic faith, is a man to be trusted.

Christians are ever ready to falsely assert that an Infidel must be an Atheist. On the contrary, generally an Infidel believes there is an intelligent power in or beyond nature who creates and governs all things. But he denies the ability of man to go beyond nature in search of such power, and by pretended interviews find out his decrees. The priest claims to be divinely commissioned to preach his own particular dogmas, and that we must believe him or perish. He is familiar with supernatural and eternal concerns; knows just what the Lord wants of us here, and what he will do with us hereafter. Apparently he is as certain of the instructions under his commission as if he had just dined with the almighty. Take note: It is the priest, not the almighty, whom I dispute. I deny his credentials.

"And you would destroy the promis of salvation through Jesus!" says an alarmed Christian. Nay, rather I would destroy the prospect of damnation through him of the many, for according to Matthew "few will be saved."

"But," it is urged, "you will destroy all hope of immortality." Not at all. If we are immortal creatures, no opinion of a Paul or a pope will make us otherwise. Myriads of human beings hav lived and died before and since the Christian era who knew nothing of Jesus. Man was immortal, if at all, before Jesus lived.

Man is born to life on this earth; and whether he likes it or not, it is plainly his duty and his gain to improve the condition of himself and those about him, and to increase the means of comfort and happiness here. If he follow this course, he will find enough to do and to enjoy, with little inclination to flounder in the abyss of some future existence.

The man who is not content with this world, who dreams, prays, strives to liv in two worlds at once, is both ungrateful and conceited. And such a course tends to insanity. Cases of mental derangement from religious emotion and perplexity are innumerable. Sometimes whole families reject the enjoyments of life in the expectation of a sudden reappearance of Jesus. Many fancy themselvs called upon to fill some divine mission or to make some sacrifice. Many degrees of religious insanity lie between the sickly youth who on the anxious seat strives to "work out his salvation with fear and trembling," and the wretched father who slays his child in fancied obedience to a divine call. Freeman and his wife, like many others, put their whole minds on the Bible and lost their reason.

All the divinity in the whole business centers in the magic wand of the priest.

Should We Hav a Day of Rest?

It is not a very pleasant position for one to be in when he is forced to differ with the great majority of those with whom he is associated in the great reform movement of the age, but it is my lot to be just in that position upon the Sunday question. Not that I hav any reverence for the seventh day of the week nor the first day, but that I am constrained to believe that one day of rest is essential to the human race. The writer was for many years a wage-worker, one who spent six days working for others, and it will be impossible to erase from his mind the satisfaction with which he regarded the coming of Sunday, as it relieved him from toil and gave him a day to spend with his family and friends at home, and I am fully persuaded that every working man and woman looks forward through the week to the coming of the one day of rest with no small degree of pleasure. Therefore I say that those who seek to abolish Sunday laws will arouse in the minds of the working classes a spirit of opposition that I feel we ought not to arouse.

Understand me distinctly, my brothers, I am not advocating Sunday laws as they are enforced in many cities, but I do advocate the enforcement of such legislation as will designate one day out of the seven days that shall be set apart as a day of rest and recreation for the benefit of the working people. A day in which the mills, factories, stores, etc., shall be compelled to shut down and allow the laborer and wage-worker twenty-four hours in which to rest and refresh himself. The rich need no such day; every day is to them a holiday; therefore, an abolition of Sunday laws would work no injury to them; but take away this day of rest from the workingman and you deprive him of the one day that he is with his family or in which he may enjoy himself.

I feel satisfied that we are doing the cause of Liberal reform a serious injury in an indiscriminate attack upon Sunday laws, for the reasons above set forth; and as an humble worker in the cause of human freedom, I ask those who are engaged in this warfare against Sunday laws to stop and consider the effect of their work upon the poor.

Without going into details I will say that nine-tenths of the wage-workers will oppose any effort to abolish these laws, and if we are ever to succeed in our warfare against the church, and its arrogant claims, we must succeed through the assistance of the overtaxed and overworked masses; and if they see that we seek to take from them their day of rest, we will at once awaken a spirit of opposition in them that no amount of argument can overcome. Say to the laborer, "We intend to abolish Sunday laws and allow men to work and mills and factories to run every day in the week alike," and nine out of ten of them will oppose you. Not that they care one iota for Sunday as a religious Sabbath, but they look upon it as a day that releases them from toil and givs them rest and recreation. Consequently, I am fully convinced that in our attacks upon these Sunday laws we should be extremely guarded as to our utterances; and if Sunday must be abolished as a day of rest, then giv the working man and woman Monday or Wednesday or some other day in which all the different mills, stores, etc., must be closed and the laborer given his day of rest.

As one wedded to the cause of mental as well as political liberty, as one enlisted for the war, I do not seek to antagonize those more fitted to lead than myself, but I am only pleading for what I consider of vital importance to our cause, the sympathy and assistance of the working men and women. It is necessary, if we hav a day of rest, that it be one day in the seven and that that one day be observed by all. To allow the Jew to observe Saturday, the Christian Sunday, and the Liberal some other day, will create confusion, but select one day and let that be Saturday, Sunday, or Wednesday, and say to the people, "This is to be observed as a day of rest and recreation for the benefit of the working people—a day in which they are to be allowed to visit the library, the theater, the racecourse, or remain with their families or go to the lecture hall, etc."—and say to the rich merchant, manufacturer, or contractor, "This day must be so observed," and you will allay any feelings of uneasiness that the wage-earner may feel, or may be aroused by designing people when discussing this question before them.

I am frequently met by this argument from my brother Liberals, who say we must not compel a man to observe any particular day for rest: We must not say to the Christian, "You must keep your place of business closed on Saturday," nor to the Jew, "You must observe Sunday," but we must allow a man to observe any or no day as it suits him. This argument is good, but it affects our brother who toils for his daily bread. The Jew would shut up his shop on Saturday and work all day Sunday, and the Christian would shut up his shop on Sunday and work all day Saturday, and if some poor man who differed with either as to the day to be observed must work or giv up his position, must violate his conscience or lose his situation, then to settle all disputes and to allow the working people one day of rest, let us select one day of the seven and make that day a legal holiday, in which all men must quit work and shut down their mills and close up their stores and allow the toiling masses to enjoy themselvs. Make that day just what reason and common sense teach us it should be, and as people become educated and freed from the bondage of church superstition they will make it a glorious day for the human race. On that day let the theater be thrown open, let the library, the lyceum, the gymnasium, the parks, the fairs, the exhibitions, and every place of amusement and instruction be opened to the poor and to their families. And if perchance some narrow, bigoted, dyspeptic creature should want to crawl into some dark synagog or church and worship Jehovah or the devil, and he finds any satisfaction in so doing, let him on that or any other day he may see fit to select, go to church and preach, sing, and pray to his heart's content.

Now, dear readers, I am one of the rank and file. I make no pretensions to lead. I am always ready to follow those older and more fitted to speak, but I simply throw out these thoughts for the good of our cause and to remove what seems to me to be a stumbling-block in the way of many that otherwise would cast their lot and influence with us.

Colonel Ingersoll's Economic Opinions.

In the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER and many political reform papers throughout the country, Col. Robert Ingersoll is the subject of much controversy. The finance, land, and transportation questions are the tripod (with numerous minor props) upon which is being erected the national People's party, and when it is known that Mr. Ingersoll would knock from under our third party organization its strongest pillar, our financial theories, he can but be regarded as but partly with the laboring element mainly composing the new party, when it comes to methods of redress. That Wall street and our nation's heads of accumulated wealth all over the country indorse Mr. Ingersoll's monetary views is patent to all; and since no stretch of the imagination can hardly warrant us in believing rich nabobs are not methodically selfish in their preachings and practices, their opinions should be received with a great degree of allowance, and the more uneasiness among them the more should the masses believe that the "hay-seed" ideas of political economy will ultimately dethrone the imperialism of wealth now dominating a debt-ridden, monopoly-cursed people. In the realm of thought Mr. Ingersoll should be regarded as a star of the first magnitude, yet from this it does not follow that his brilliancy wholly eclipses all "lesser lights." On subjects to which the great Agnostic has given special study, he is doubtless strongly intrenched against every opposition, and while with THE TRUTH SEEKER we accord to him the "modesty of great genius," it has also been truthfully said "the age of universal geniuses has passed," and to find an occasional topic upon which Mr. Ingersoll is not in the van should cause no desertion from the great army of his admirers. No man knows any more than he has learned, and the intelligent are as ignorant of what they do not know as are other people.

That money is the fiat of a sovereign government, independent of the substance upon which the decree is placed, is confidently accepted by hundreds of thousands, the foremost of whose thinkers are recorded among the brainiest men and women of the nation.

From this fact alone, no one should be surprised if counter opinions fall flat when dropped, even by Mr. Ingersoll, among men who hav thought and are still thinking for themselvs upon the political questions of the day. And when it is learned that the highest economic authorities of the world do not support Mr. Ingersoll's intrinsic-value ideas of money, he should not suffer humiliation at the suggestion that he farther investigate this all-important subject. We consider the colonel a benefactor, but for the masses to accept dogmatically his or any other person's political views, is to commit the same mistake as do the religious dupes who blindly swallow the dogmas of priestcaft. To Watson Heston.

O genius of the pencil, pen,
A mental giant among men,
A Hercules of power;
Your pen and pencil hav great might,
Truth to defend, uphold the right,
And make Old Error cower.

Nor schools nor teachers gave you skill,
But love of truth, persistence, will,
Conception, and design;
That fertil brain proclaims your power,
Magnificent, "of strength a tower,"
And from no "royal line."

Culture, science, art, and truth,
'Mid toil and poverty of youth,
Inspired your human soul,
That brain to think, that hand to trace,
Show up old Superstition's face,
And godly priests' control.

The images of that brain prolific,
From old Atlantic to Pacific,
Hav saved, exalted, blessed;
Shall crown you with immortal fame,
Perpetuate your noble name
Indelibly impressed.

Your graphic pictures, diagrams,
Expose most vividly the shams
And falsities of man;
Freethought, truth, liberty contrast
With all that human life doth blast
And orthodoxy's plan.

Your pictures hav a thousand tongues
To impress, illustrate human wrongs,
And devilish, God-like deeds;
To bring to light both church and state,
Their machinations small and great,
Demolish heartless creeds.

Great worker for the human race,
You well deserve the highest place
In human hearts and brains;
Nor writers nor impressiv speakers
Wield greater power in TRUTH SEEKERS
To sever slavery's chains.

Oh, may your genius long remain,
Truth, right, and justice to maintain,
Spread scientific light.
May all Freethinkers in the land
Sustain you with both heart and hand
In your most holy fight.

Christian Civilization.

"But we must hav them." These words, according to the report of a large and respectable paper (the Sioux City Journal), were the answer of the mayor of Sioux City when asked by a reporter, "What will be done toward suppressing the houses of prostitution that infest this city?" And then the same paper goes on to describe some of the houses used for this nefarious purpose and the inmates. Alas for the description! Men of thirty-five and forty years of age closeted with young girls of fifteen years, mere children! In the four houses visited by this reporter, he says, not one girl was found over twenty years old. These girls were not from the dregs of society; their language and dress showed them to be from what we are wont to call good families. Their beauty was not yet gone, their tones were gentle, their conversation was refined. These children were destined to lives so degrading that my mother's heart wails aloud in the contemplation and instinctivly I thank the fates that I am childless.

But the mayor of that city says "we must hav them." Such is Christian civilization.

In another large city in this great Northwest there is an institution known as the "Erring Woman's Refuge," where, as a recent report says, there is a family of eighty persons, nearly all of them young girls. On my recent journey to Orange City I stopped in that city (Chicago), and was the guest of the superintendent, a long-time friend, Mrs. H. N Woods, for a few days. While there I used my Yankee proclivities for asking questions, making myself acquainted by personal knowledge with some things in the history of erring woman that do not always get before the public. A short time before my visit there were sent to that institution girls to the number of fourteen, not one of them fifteen years of age. The police of the city had for some reason broken into a den containing these girls, as well as some of maturer age. These young girls were considered too young for the "Bridewell;" besides, they were suffering with sickness, some with a disease so foul that my pen refuses to name it (our government does not allow the use of naughty words lest the mail bag be defiled; oh, righteous government!), all stained, broken down physically and morally. Some of them had no feeling of guilt; saw no wrong in the life. If this is Christian civilization, would not savage life be preferable?

But, Mr. Editor, would it not be well to find out if this assertion, "We must hav them," is true, and what we are doing toward refuting this assertion? If my sex is necessarily to be profaned by the more than hellish lust of man, we ought to know why the necessity, and find an antidote. When this den was raided in Chicago and these twelve helpless children sent to prison (for prison it is, only gilded), what became of those monsters who had stolen their innocence? Had twelve houses been robbed of jewels and plate to the amount of $12,000, how many detectivs would hav been employed to find the thieves, and when found all the powers of the government would hav been called upon to convict and punish the robbers. Say you, the keeper of the brothel was fined or imprisoned? Was the keeper, the one degraded man, the real robber? I tell you, nay! Why does a man—or, if you please, a woman—keep such places, only that men, respectable men, may come, and by paying the sum required, gratify the lust that destroys the innocence of my own sex? How profitable would such a business be if every man who contributed to its income was "spotted" by a detectiv, tried for destroying a human being, a much more valuable article than the jewel that decks the person of the ladies of our households? Why does one sex go free and the other receive the penalty for wrong-doing? As long as the community allows two codes of morals, one for the masculin, the other for the feminin, so long will men respectable enough to be mayors of our cities say, "We must hav them."

But is the necessity of sexual gratification to be always admitted, and marriage, even, to be the hotbed of debauchery for one sex, while the victim loses her personality in being always expected, and by Christian law commanded, to submit to her husband? Would it not be at least the beginning of a remedy for this assertion, "We must hav them," to assert and maintain, by early teaching, at the fireside of the home, in the school-room, and in the councils of government, that henceforth there is and can be but one law for the human being be it male or female; and that, last but not least, in marriage or out sex is not a commodity of traffic; that its use is wholly confined to the affections, and that woman belongs only to herself? I am well aware that the teachings of the Bible are all contrary to my assertions, but I acknowledge no law which is in contradiction to the law of my being, be it a statute law made by the men of modern times or a law made by men of the long, long ago.

Woman is a secondary matter in all the laws of the Bible; but some transactions recorded in that book prove that the morals of that time were, as respects my sex, much as to-day. Whether houses of infamy were licensed in the olden time I do not know, but that they were tolerated I should think, as the attendants of King David had no difficulty in procuring a young girl for his lecherous bed—a man after God's own heart.

An article from my pen would hardly be credited as genuin without a "reminiscence." In one of the years now far back in the distance, in a city of western New York, the municipal treasury was getting low, and so a raid was made upon some of the houses tolerated for the purposes of vice. The offenders were severally fined. One young woman was questioned as to the money she was paying. Said the judge who pronounced the sentence, "Are you sure this bill is good?" "Why, yes, I think so," said she; "you paid it to me last night."

My paper is perhaps too long; but if your readers tire of it, they are not roused to the pitch of indignation that I am as I contemplate the condition which woman holds under the laws of Christian civilization. LUCY N. COLMAN.

Religion in Public Schools.

There is, speaking generally, so little to commend in ministers and church journals—they are usually so bigoted, intolerant, blind to the rights of others, and desirous to build up their creeds at the expense of the great public and in defiance of the public's equal rights—that it is a pleasure as well as spring of hope to find printed in a church paper, and written by a minister, an article saying over again what the Infidels hav been saying on the subject of the Bible in the public schools. The article is by the Rev. C. Herbert Richardson, printed in the Christian Advocate, Methodist organ, and for the benefit of the Methodist neighbors of the readers of this paper we select its salient points.

The frequent assaults of the Roman Catholic church upon the common school system of the several states, begins Mr. Richardson, and recent decisions of some of the state courts upon the reading of the Bible in the public schools—notably that of Wisconsin—hav centered the attention of the public upon this question, evoked much variety of opinion, and caused considerable agitation of the matter. The supreme importance of the subject to the welfare of our country is self-evident, and the far-reaching consequences of any proper settlement of it demand the utmost wisdom and statesmanship in attempting it. It should be approached, therefore, in a calm, dispassionate, and equitable spirit, unmoved by the position which the church of Rome occupies concerning it, and be settled on the basis of justice, constitutional right, and scriptural authority. Any statute or practice which cannot be rested on these grounds is indefensible, and it will be a sad day for Protestantism and Americanism—twin sisters in the cause of civil and religious liberty—when they rest their cause, even against Rome, on grounds other than those stated above. "Let justice be done, though the heavens fall!"

On the basis of justice and constitutional right the question should be settled, of course; but "scriptural authority" lugged into a political question is as much out of place as the Bible in the schools. Besides, "scriptural authority" is too apt to be what the appellant himself thinks. And to claim Protestantism as even the most distant relativ of religious liberty is to strain language and forget the part Protestantism played before it was ousted from civil power. There was a time, as a Western elder put it in his Fourth of July speech, when if two Presbyterians should meet one Quaker they felt that it had been foreordained from all eternity that they should bore holes in his ears and tongue. If two Catholics should meet one Presbyterian the spirit generally moved them to hang him. If two of any religious sect should meet a Baptist they would drown him for the simple reason that he "believed n much water." The Church of England seemed to hav a special spite at the Quaker. If he was caught at the public assembly he was fined five hundred pounds of tobacco for being a disturber of the peace, and if he did not attend he was fined the same for being a non-conformist. The truth seems to be, that it was a crime to be a Quaker. It was the law that if any family had a child born unto them and should fail to carry it to a proper minister, ordained by parliament, and hav it sprinkled, they should be fined two thousand pounds of tobacco, half to go to the public and half to the informant. There were six Baptist ministers all in the Culpepper county, Va., jail at one time for preaching immersion. And often when the Baptists were baptizing, the Episcopalians would go to the water's edge, and for a little innocent amusement, play a game of seven up. Cooking on Sunday was strictly forbidden. A man could see his wife to church but was not permitted to sit with her. There was, at one time, a law against a man kissing his wife on Sunday. And if a child should manifest a desire to crack walnuts or pitch quoits on Sunday, it was thought to be ample proof of total depravity. This was, of course, in those "good old times" when Protestantism was Americanism. But we will let Mr. Richardson say on, for he makes fewer slips as he proceeds.

First, he asks, what is the nature and character of our public school system? And to this, he answers: It is a system supported and maintained by the state by funds raised from all classes of citizens without regard to religious or other distinction. It is solely and exclusivly the creature of the state. The text-books which are used therein and its entire economy are the product of state legislation, and the state is a community composed of Romanists, Protestants, Jews, Atheists, etc. Now, among the things which are prohibited by the constitutions of all the States (see Cooley on Constitutional Limitations) are:

1. Any law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof.

2. Any compulsory support, by taxation or otherwise, of religious instruction.

The question then at once arises: "Is the use of the Bible in the public schools a part of the religious or secular instruction thereof?" No one will take the ground that the Bible is to be used as a secular book, and for purposes of secular instruction. Its own pages refuse all such claim to it. "Thus saith the Lord," is its characteristic. The grounds upon which its use is sometimes urged, namely, its historical, literary, or scientific excellence, not only reflect upon the distinct basis on which the book rests, and which giv it its real and supreme importance, but in effect surrender the position claimed for it by such advocates. For, if the Bible is to be used in the schools on any other grounds than that it is "The Word of God," that "Thus saith the Lord," not only is its unique and divine basis surrendered, but it is placed in competition with other books on terms other than those which constitute its solitary greatness, and becomes a mere rival of them on grounds of inferior and ordinary character.

The position then must be taken that religious instruction is properly a part of any state system of education, and that the Bible as the most eminent religious book—the word of God—should be used therein for such purpose. It is sometimes said that the use of the Bible is, "only to be read without note or comment," etc. It is to be handled very tenderly, as if dangerous; no explanation must be made of what is read; it is a kind of "sesame," which is opened for five or more minutes a day, and then closed. It must be apparent to anyone how much such a treatment of the Bible not only degrades it as the word of God, but has a tendency just the opposit of what is contended for, namely to weaken rather than elevate it. And the illogical character of such a position is self-evident, for if the Bible is of right in the public schools, it is right to explain and enforce what it says; the whole book is there, and it should be treated with the reverence and authority which it claims for itself as supreme authority over man in matters of faith and morals. Now, such a position for it in the public schools is distinctly un-American and unconstitutional. It is unconstitutional because it is in effect,

1. A union between church and state.

2. Because it necessitates compulsory support by taxation of religious instruction.

3. Because repugnant to freedom of conscience.

It is a union between church and state because it makes the state the creator and maintainer of religious instruction; it compels by taxation the support of the same because the funds which maintain it are taken from the common treasury of the state, to which all classes of citizens, without regard to creed, etc., are compelled to contribute; and it is repugnant to freedom of conscience because by such taxation it forces one to the support of a book which he may not believe in at all.

These are distinctivly and traditionally Romish ideas and principles. Strange that Protestants and friends of the public school system should encamp on and fortify the ground of their ancient and unrelenting foes!

It is un-American because the whole theory and practice of the American state is for the complete separation of church and state and "hands off" of the former by the latter. It recognizes no rights of the state over the conscience, religious belief, or practice of the individual. To admit such right is to surrender the church to the state; for if the latter can prescribe at all in such matters, where is its authority to end, and who shall say what shall be its limits?

Mr. Richardson also protests against the Bible in the schools on Christian grounds. He believes its use to be "directly contrary to the purpose and command of our Lord Jesus Christ as set forth in the New Testament." "Christ's kingdom"—and here Mr. Richardson talks just like a Seventh Day Adventist—"is not of this world; moral questions are not to be decided by legislatures and common councils; majorities do not count in questions of conscience. Concede that the state may put the Bible into the public schools and you must concede the state may decide what Bible—the King James version, the Douay version, the Jewish version, etc.—is to go in, and where either faith has a majority in the legislature, common council, etc., the minority must submit. And if the state may put it in it can also order it out, or it can prescribe what portions of it shall be read, and how; and again the minority must submit."

There is so much sound sense and solid logic in Mr. Richardson's consideration of the question that we are surprised to find it in a Methodist organ. But we are quite willing to giv even the Methodists their dues, and the more so as if this shall become the prevailing sentiment among the followers of Wesley their numerical importance makes a real separation of church and state a matter of easier accomplishment. It is their boast that they once elected a president and that they can do it again. This perhaps is true. At any rate, if every Methodist agreed with Mr. Richardson the Bible would soon be scarce in public schools.

Christ and the Apostles and the "Higher Critics."

Howard Crosby, in one of his discourses, said that the inspiration of the Old Testament was attested by no less a person than Christ himself, and that those who rejected the doctrin of such inspiration practically rejected Christ, and the inference naturally followed that such were not Christians.

The fact that the people who wrote the New Testament—whoever they were—believed that the Old was necessary to their work is beyond dispute. They made Christ indorse it, as well as the apostles. The Independent, when the Professor Briggs controversy arose, took the same view as did Mr. Crosby, who was probably the ablest Presbyterian preacher in this country. It reminded the higher critics that Christ, in his Sermon on the Mount, said: "Think not that I am come to destroy the law or the prophets; I am not come to destroy, but to fulfill. For I say unto you, Till the heaven and earth pass, one jot or one tittle shall in no wise pass from the law, till all be fulfilled" (Matt. v, 17–18); and quoted other passages to show that Jesus (supposing him to hav said what is attributed to him) believed the Old Testament to be from the Lord. To the Jews in Jerusalem he said: "Search the scriptures, for in them ye think ye hav eternal life; and they are they which testify of me" (John v, 39). On the same occasion he also said: "For had ye believed Moses, ye would hav believed me; for he wrote of me" (John v, 46). In the evening of the day in which he arose from the dead he said to his apostles: "These are the words which I spake unto you, while I was yet with you, that all things must be fulfilled which were written in the law of Moses, and in the prophets, and in the psalms concerning me." Then "opened he their understandings that they might understand the scriptures" (Luke xxiv, 44–45). "He quoted passages from these scriptures at sundry times, and from different parts, in support of his own teaching, and often made incidental allusions to facts which they record, as the original establishment of marriage in the Garden of Eden, the murder of Abel by Cain, the destruction of the world by the flood in the days of Noah, the life of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and that of Moses, the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah, the wife of Lot, the preaching of Jonah to the people of Nineveh, and various other items scattered all through the Old Testament history. He used that history freely, and always assumed its truth, and based that truth on the authority of God himself."

The apostles too, the Independent shows, agreed with Jesus. Peter, in the following words, givs his opinion of these scriptures: "For the prophecy came not in old time by the will of man; but holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost" (2 Peter i, 21). This statement, while excluding their purely human origin, makes them the product of "holy men of God" speaking "as they were moved by the Holy Ghost." Peter hence said: "If any man speak, let him speak as the oracles of God" (1 Peter iv, 11). He referred to the Holy Ghost as speaking by the mouth of David in respect to the action of Judas in the betrayal of Jesus" (Acts i, 16). In his Pentecostal address he quoted a prophecy from Joel and two prophecies from David as pertinent to the facts with which he was then dealing, and addressed the argument to those who believed in the divine commission and inspiration of Joel and David (Acts ii, 14–31). His discourse, called forth by the healing of the lame man at the Beautiful Gate of the temple, led him again to refer to the Jewish scriptures as having been fulfilled in Christ (Acts iii, 17–25). Both his speeches and his writings show what he thought of these scriptures.

Paul, having in the eye of his mind the same scriptures, wrote as follows to Timothy, who from his childhood had been instructed therein: "All scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrin, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness, that the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works" (2 Tim. iii, 15–17). This statement is universal, without exception or qualification. The apostle often quoted incidents and passages from the Jewish scriptures, spoke of them collectivly as "the oracles of God," and never intimated the slightest doubt as to their "inerrancy." His uniform treatment of them shows the fullest confidence in them as the inspired word of God. His speech to the Jews in Antioch in Pisidia consists, in part, in the recital of facts stated in these scriptures (Acts xiii, 16–22). At Thessalonica he reasoned with the Jews "out of the scriptures, opening and alleging that Christ must needs hav suffered, and risen again from the dead" (Acts xvii, 2, 3). He did the same thing when he was a prisoner at Rome, "persuading" the Jews "concerning Jesus, both out of the law of Moses and out of the prophets" (Acts xxviii, 23). His epistles abound with allusions to facts of Old Testament history, some of which date back to the Garden of Eden, and the temptation and sin of our first parents.

So, also, in the Epistle to the Hebrews, it is said, with direct reference to the Old Testament, that God "at sundry times, and in divers manners, spake in time past unto the fathers by the prophets" (Heb. i, 1). God himself, according to this statement, was the speaker, and the prophets were simply the medium of the speaking. What they said he said through them. "Wherefore as the Holy Ghost saith" is a phrase applied in this epistle to language quoted from the Old Testament (Heb. iii, 7).

These references lead the Independent to conclude that Christians can do but one thing—accept the entire scriptures as the word of God. That Christ and his apostles set their seal of authority to the "divine and inspired origin" of these books "is a fact not to be evaded by any exegetical sophistry." This fact, it says, "applies to the whole Old Testament as an aggregate, from Genesis to Malachi," and "to suppose that Christ and his apostles committed a mistake in their view of the Old Testament scriptures, or that they openly adopted and avowed a current Jewish belief which they did not really accept, is to assume a theory that discredits them as religious teachers, since it either calls in question their capacity, or impeaches their absolute integrity. It is not logically possible to avoid this result, if we reject their teaching on the point to which it is so clearly committed. We must accept the teaching, or discredit the teachers."

What can the "higher critics" say to this? Were Christ and the apostles ignorant, or insincere, or are the words attributed to them not theirs? And if so, of what value is the New Testament, and, therefore, the whole Christian scheme?

That the later critics hav pretty completely destroyed a belief in the inspiration of the Old if not in the New Testament is a fact patent to the most careless reader of current literature on the subject. But they hav not dealt with this side of the question, and the orthodox hav the stronger argument over them so long as they maintain that Christ was divine. There is but one escape for them, and that is to giv up the New Testament as a historical or divine work, and consequently giv up the Christian religion, admitting at once that it is purely imaginary, the conception of an ignorant people to explain seeming mysteries and to make recompense for earthly wrongs and inequalities of social conditions. We hope that the Independent will push its point with the Christians of Professor Briggs's school, and force them to choose between Christ and common sense.

The Spirit of Charles Bradlaugh.

Whenever a famous man dies some "medium" will shortly thereafter produce a message from him. Within a week after the death of D. M. Bennett a Spiritualist journal published a communication by him announcing that he had become spirit editor of that paper and the earthly editor thereof demanded the subscription list of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Other communications alleged to be from him came in thick and fast, many of them emanating from a medium since proven to be a common trickster. Other "sensitivs" copied his published writings and brazenly maintained that they had just received them from the other world.

In the National Reformer, Charles Bradlaugh's paper, we find that he is subjected to the same system of libeling. A Mr. Reedman, of Birmingham, at a séance in that city wrote at Mr. Bradlaugh's dictation "in a perfectly unconscious state, and on the departure of the influence was much surprised on being told of the nature of the communication," which was as follows:

"As I am not to speak, I am to say in writing, I hav found a life beyond the grave that I did not wish for nor believe in; but it is even so. My voice shall yet declare it. I hav to undo all, or nearly all, I hav done, but I will not complain. My mind is subdued, but I will be a man. It is a most glorious truth that has now more clearly dawned upon my mind, that there is a grand and noble purpose before all men, worth living for! May this be the dawn of a new and glorious era of the spiritual life of your humble friend, Charles Bradlaugh.

"There is a God! There is a divine principle. There is more in life than we wot of, but vastly more in death! Oh, for a thousand tongues to declare the truths which are now fast dawning upon my bewildered mind! Death, the great leveler, need hav no more terrors for us, for it has been conquered by the great spirit, in giving us a never-ending life in the glorious spheres of immortal bliss. Oh, my friends, may I be permitted to declare more fully and fervently the joys which fill my mind! Language fails, no pen can describe."

Naturally, if this came from Mr. Bradlaugh, he has found a life beyond the grave, and there is no need for his voice to declare it; but where did he find God a "divine principle?" However, if this be real, there is one truth in it—that death is a great leveler! It has leveled Mr. Bradlaugh from his mountainous hight as a man to the plain of a mere repeater of twiddle-de-dee phrases as disgusting as senseless. If the philosophy of Spiritualism be true it is unfortunate that so many fools and charlatans represent its phenomenal side.

Kentucky's New Constitution.

In the Kentucky constitutional convention, to which we made frequent reference while it was in session, the Christian advocates of injustice won, for the new constitution to be voted on next August commands the legislature to exempt from taxation the property of superstition. The section (176) dealing with this matter reads:

"There shall be exempt from taxation public property used for public purposes; places actually used for religious worship, with the grounds attached thereto and used and appurtenant to the house of worship, not exceeding one half acre in cities or towns, and not exceeding two acres in the country; places of burial not held for private or corporate profit, institutions of purely public charity, and institutions of education not used or employed for gain by any person or corporation, and the income of which is devoted solely to the cause of education; public libraries, their endowments and the income of such property as is used exclusivly for their maintenance; all parsonages or residences owned by any religious society and occupied as a home, and for no other purpose, by the minister of any religion."

This is broad enough to do a great deal of injustice. It takes in all the burdensome church institutions and the parasitic preachers' residences. There has been no actual progress in this regard in Kentucky, though the best and brightest minds of the convention which drew up the constitution were in favor of taxing the joss-houses and their appurtenant institutions.

But section 13 of the Bill of Rights which precedes the organic document states that no man's property shall be taken or applied to public use without the consent of his representativs nor without just compensation. We should like to know how the legislators reconcile this right with the fact that the people's property, i.e., their cash, is taken from them to protect churches without any compensation whatever being rendered. We recommend the Kentuckians to reflect upon the statements of Mr. Samuel Roberts, before the Englewood, Ill., Social Science Club, to wit: "In 1880 it was estimated that there was in the United States $746,294,833 worth of untaxed church property. In 1890 the estimate was $1,500,000,000. This estimate is based on the statistics furnished in President Grant's message to Congress in 1875, in which General Grant was not afraid to call the untaxing of church property by its regular name—evil. It is, as one writer remarks, the most stupendous steal on record. The continued acquisition of real estate by the church, or, indeed, by any corporation, is a serious matter. The Christian churches of this country are defrauding the people of from $30,000,000 to $40,000,000 annually by the non-payment of taxes on their property. Is it not high time, in behalf of morality, to call a halt? The God which the church professes to worship tells them in his word, 'Thou shalt not steal.' Yet no effort is made on the part of either priest or flock to enforce that command so far as they are concerned. The church of to-day robs Cæsar of his just dues, and makes God a receiver of stolen property. This method is only in keeping with the scheme of atonement and redemption, which is to shift their defalcations upon somebody else's shoulders and then sing, 'Jesus paid it all; all the tax we owe.' With the exception of one lady minister of the Universalist church, I hav not heard a voice from any of the clergy in favor of the taxing of church property. There are millions of people who never go inside of a church and yet they are obliged to pay their share of the $30,000,000 or $40,000,000 which the church does not pay. Is this honest? Is it good morals? Is it carrying out the command of the founder of the church, 'Do unto others as you would that others should do unto you.' The leaders of the church of to-day know what they are not doing, when they fail to move in an effort to remedy an evil which is in their power to remedy. Is it a wonder that there are so many defaulters and thieves who graduate from the church yearly? What else can be expected? If the church steals why should not its members do the same?"

ON July 7th the ordinance committee of the city council of Bradford, Pa., made the following sensible report on the Sunday observance ordinance: "Your committee to whom the within ordinance and petition was referred report adversely for the following reasons: "The ordinance is framed in accordance with the act of 1794, and we believe that such a law belongs to the Dark Ages, and never should hav been enacted by this great commonwealth, settled by William Penn and his Quaker friends. We believe such a law is antagonistic to the principles of this republic, knowing that it would, if enforced, deprive all laboring people of recreation; and, furthermore, that it is an infringement on the liberty of men, women, and children. We believe the majority of those who signed this petition did so in ignorance of the fact that the act of 1794, which is a dead letter on the statute books, givs them the same powers this ordinance calls for. The only effect city legislation can hav is to transfer the burden of enforcing this statute from the petitioners to the city, thereby relieving themselvs of the responsibility and odium of prosecuting the offenders against this law. Your committee deem it unwise to place such responsibility and expense upon the city. We recommend to the good people of Bradford that they can best secure the closing of all business places on Sunday by declining to purchase anything on that day. No buyers, no sellers."

Chunks In Christianity's Wheels.

PLAINVILLE, GA., June 29, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I learn many lessons from THE TRUTH SEEKER. I can and do throw a good many chunks in Christianity's cruel wheel now, and as I grow stronger will break some spokes, I hope. A. J. ABLES.

Well-placed Money.

NEW YORK, July 6, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: In response to your recent circular I inclose $5 for publication fund. Pity so much money is given to support priestcraft and a hell, and so little for freedom—more for a curse than to remove it.

Yours fraternally, L. G. REED.

Must Proselyte Amid Hideous Yells.

PAULINE, ARK., June 17, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I think I can get a few subscribers soon, though the time is now at hand when the ignorant fanatics of this country begin their brush harbor meetings, making night hideous with their yells. Success, I say, to THE TRUTH SEEKER, and all Liberal papers; also to individuals who are working for freedom, light, and advancement.

DR. W. R. BACHELOR.

Sowers of the Seed.

SHARON, MASS., June 21, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: The "Text-Book," etc., ordered by us last week, came duly in good condition. The "Text-Book" is a decidedly unique collection of fun and fact, an inexhaustible fund of entertainment and instruction. It will be used judiciously as seed for future orders, which we hope will materialize. Yours, ALDEN & BARRON, Publishers Sharon Ozone, Foxboro Reporter, etc.

Frontier Grit.

CLEAR LAKE, July 12, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I am an old frontiersman, uneducated, consequently unable to write my thoughts intelligibly. I hav done an immense amount of labor in my time (was sixty-eight last Christmas) and but very little writing, but I am proud that I am entirely clear of the popular superstitions. In regard to the pictures in THE TRUTH SEEKER, I will say that I am delighted with most of them, but do not feel as free in presenting the paper to my Christian friends as if it did not contain the pictures. M. G. ST. JOHN.

True Devotion.

ITHACA, N. Y., July 10, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: "Captain William F. Davis, boats 'Agnostic' and 'Robert G. Ingersoll,' care of Lighton Bros., Syracuse, N. Y." The above is the name and address of the captain of two of the best boats that hav been built in this city for years, and the captain is able to hold an argument with the best theologian in the world on the improbabilities of the Bible. I hav lately become acquainted with him, and he is a gentleman and a scholar.

I am going to send you some money for copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER and sell them on the street. I can knock out all the priests in the world in an argument. I shall get my pension in August, and you will hear from me. I am fully alive on this subject and shall spend the remainder of my days in trying to convince the people that we are ruled by priestcraft. I am old Bob Ingersoll the second, only not as smart. I am poor, but will do all I can to help our cause.

WILLIAM L. MARSH.

Unanswerable Criticisms.

STRASBURG, ILL., July 13, 291.

MR. EDITOR: I hav measured THE TRUTH SEEKER. It is neither too short nor too long. It makes its appearance regularly. It is, in fact, the only one of the kind, and should I suggest any change I might destroy its individuality. It might be well enough to keep after the church until they will tell the truth and say they do not believe; but their actions speak louder than words. When they lay their hands on the sick, they do not recover. They will not drink deadly poison, or cast out devils. Even their prayers are not answered. "They that believe not shall be damned." I do not believe it. "These signs shall follow them that believe." They do not believe that. So what is the difference? "All liars hav their part with the devil" (or words to that effect). There are very few preachers that believe that.

The pictures are just right. I see by the last paper why the church clings so lovingly to the devil—if his fork should slip the whole thing would go to smash. A. YORK.

An Over-sea Friend.

PETERBORO, ENGLAND, June 21, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find an English money-order for 2s.1d. for a pamphlet entitled "Some Mistakes of Moses," advertised in THE TRUTH SEEKER, which is a paper you perhaps would not think would reach me at the address I hav given. I hav a friend living at Philadelphia who occasionally sends me a copy, and I am very pleased to say that I think you are successfully waging a war against the disciples of that perdition and bigotry wrongfully called Christianity. The cartoons you publish in THE TRUTH SEEKER are as good for the cause as our much-vaunted one-hundred-ton guns. I always hav a lot of applications for the loan of THE TRUTH SEEKER when I hav one sent me, and I am very pleased to lend them, as by so doing it is applying a little leaven that will work the whole mass, and I find that more notice is taken of a paper than of argument. I believe that I am the only one in the village that has the courage to speak in terms contradictory of the book of Fables, and although not able to do much single-handed, I hav already been able to convince a few of the absurdity of the book they believe in, and others are halting between two opinions. But it is surprising the hold the parsons hav gained over the minds of the people. I myself am a nativ of Northampton, and while there was an ardent supporter of the late Charles Bradlaugh; and I am sorry that we in England hav not an activ leader to take his place.

With my best wishes to yourself and for the success of your paper, Yours sincerely, GEO. REYNOLDS.

Corrupted to Buy Religious Trash.

RICEVILLE, IA., June 22, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I am longing for a copy of the Bible Picture Book. It will without doubt be a "stunner" to priestcraft. I am already dreaming of the "Pictorial Text-Book" No. 2. And so we are continually supplied with delicious mind-food. O thou glorious TRUTH SEEKER, as the week draws toward the end then I long to see you, and one thought always comes to my mind, which is this, "I wonder what picture the great, glorious Mr. Heston has designed for THE TRUTH SEEKER this week." I am unable to find sufficient language to express myself and let you know how well I am pleased with your paper. I am to be compared with a boy who expects a visit from a kind friend every week to gladden his heart—my heart-gladdener is THE TRUTH SEEKER.

When I look around and see how much money there is spent for worthless papers filled with religious trash and other nonsense, then I feel sorrow that the majority of the people hav not the good sense and courage to giv THE TRUTH SEEKER the patronage which it deserves so well. But the priests and ministers hav corrupted the minds of the people to such an extent, and so filled their brain with prejudice, that they will not listen to reason, but will cling to the old superstition and reject the truth. I remain,

A hater of sky-pilots, HENRY BISSON.

A Point in That Noble English Struggle.

NEW DULUTH, MINN., July 6, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Although a subscriber for a number of years I hav never written one line to be printed in your paper before, as I do not believe in encumbering a paper of so much value with what might appear as nonsense. Truth and knowledge is what I am after; call it nonsense if you choose.

In a controversy with a Bible Christian, the question arose, Did Charles Bradlaugh take the prescribed oath before taking his seat in Parliament? Not being conversant with the matter I had to giv in. I hav no doubt that your paper has printed the facts, but I failed to read it if so. Now, what I want to know is this, Did the bill affecting the oath in England pass—i. e., Charles Bradlaugh's? And what changes did the bill make? Not seeing any letters from this part, and this being my first, I may as well break the ice. I hope this will not be my last. I am,

Yours for Freethought, H. H. SALMON.

[After making a heroic struggle for his right to affirm, Mr. Bradlaugh complied with "the forms of the House," which means, he took the oath. Why he did so is told by himself in "The True Story of My Parliamentary Struggle," pp. 75–8. He afterward obtained the enactment of a law allowing anyone to affirm who objects to the oath.—ED. T. S.]

They Did Not Forbid Investigation.

HANNIBAL, MO., June 25, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Your correspondent James Beck, of Yakima, Wash., is in a quandary. He has been driven to the wall, and is trying to bore through it, but finds it impenetrable. No wonder he flinches and feels the need of prayer. Several months ago he asserted in THE TRUTH SEEKER that the Brotherhood of Moralists forbade its members the right of free investigation. The first clause in our Bond of Union, which is a part of our constitution, reads as follows: "We hold it to be self-evident that enlightened human reason, untrammeled by prejudice, is the highest tribunal known to man, and that every rational being has an inalienable right to investigate and decide for himself all questions pertaining to his present or future welfare." When the attention of your readers was called to the fact above stated Mr. Beck subsided for a time, but in your 4th of July number he makes a feeble effort to defend himself by insinuating that his criticism was so severe (?) as to force us to change that part of our constitution, and that it did not read that way in "one of the original copies of the constitution" which he saw somewhere or somewhere else. Now, this (like the ghosts he sees) is all in his mind. I hav been chairman of the committee on printing of constitutions ever since the first type was set, and hav given the matter special attention, and I am positiv that there never has been a copy of the Brotherhood of Moralists' constitution issued which does not contain the above-quoted passage, word for word, unless some malicious person has been printing spurious copies, which I hardly think is the case. A. R. AYRES,

Chairman of the Propaganda Committee of the Brotherhood of Moralists.

Liberals Should Set a Shining Example.

KIMBALL, S. D., June 26, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I was really surprised, and more, I felt really unpleasant, to think that such a large number of your patrons were in arrears. When I see the members of the different churches pay so liberally to support their foolish nonsense, and we who are so ably instructed from the pages of the best paper on earth pay so slackly, I feel ashamed of the company I am in. We claim to be Liberal in our views; do let us be liberal enough to pay what is your honest due.

I would not be deprived of the paper for far more than I pay for it, even for no more than the pleasure I take in reading the "Letters from Friends." This part is to me like the good old days of Methodist love-feasts. I really enjoyed them, but what are they compared to these kind words from friends? This part is the first that engages my attention. It is really encouraging to read letters from dear friends who were left behind when we came West to seek our fortunes, and who were at parting wedded to their church dogmas, but hav been liberated and now rejoice in the truths as advocated by Freethinkers. It is not to be wondered at if some of us get in arrears who try to liv in this God forsaken, dried, and parched-up country, where we cannot raise enough to subsist on, and hav had to be helped from the liberal ones East who happened to see our letters published in your columns. I hav to acknowledge the gifts of friends through this means.

Now I wish to say what I hav been looking for a long time. There are no doubt many Freethinkers in South Dakota scattered over this big country, and I hav hoped that a call would be made to get together and organize and get acquainted. The Liberals are sadly deficient in this matter. Brethren, this should not be so. Let us hear about this matter.

I failed to get the paper which had the cartoon, "How to Convert Infiddles." I saw a copy at a neighbor's.

JOHN MCKEE.

Pious Misrepresentations.

MARQUETTE, KAN., July 6, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Mr. Murat Halstead, writing editorially in the Cincinnati Commercial Gazette, has occasion to refer to Dr. Lewis Marshall, the youngest brother of Chief-justice Marshall, speaking more particularly of his many affairs of honor, as dueling was in those days termed. As he brings his remarks with reference to Dr. Marshall to a close he says as follows: "Dr. Lewis Marshall, who was a polished scholar of profound learning, was an Infidel during his young manhood, but afterward became converted, and would never recur to any of his various affairs of honor, and for anyone else to do so in his presence gave him deep offense."

Now, I would like to know if Mr. Murat Halstead intended to insinuate that Infidelity, in the sense we understand the term to be used here, is or ever was, either directly or indirectly, responsible for the existence of this barbarous mode of settling difficulties. Certainly the order in which the ideas are set forth is strongly suggestiv of cause and effect, and justifies such an interpretation, and no Christian will miss the opportunity to urge the stigma, while intelligent Infidels will suffer the smart of so false and malicious a fling. But I would like to know another thing: Was this Dr. Lewis Marshall ever an Infidel? I cannot be satisfied on Mr. Halstead's authority, for any man who will deliberately write such a slanderous insinuation will invent a falsehood to be the occasion of it and make himself doubly a liar for Christ's sake. Mr. Halstead ought to write history and biography to be peddled by Christian book agents, and then he would be an honored servant of the most high God in the sense of that spirit as set forth in 1 Kings xxii, 22: "I will be a lying spirit in the mouth of all his prophets." Such tactics seem to be perfectly justifiable from a Christian standpoint and expressly countenanced by scripture example.

C. PUTNAM.

Is Government Tyranny?

LETCHER, CAL., June 26, 291.

MR. EDITOR: I hav just read "Letters to Workingmen," by A. L. Ballou, and I must say that it is one of the best and clearest expositions of the views on government and its selfish and oppressiv administration that can well be set forth. It should be printed in letters of gold and read, as one reads a guide-board, at the crossing of the ways.

He rightly says "that no government has yet been based upon the consent of the governed, since the ballot only gives the nominal consent of a part of the governed." So, in the family, children are governed without their consent and are not allowed to protest against wrongs inflicted upon them; but when old enough and strong enough they resent undue restraint and seek their freedom.

The ax was laid at the root of the tree of evil when he said, "The God idea breeds aristocracy and oppressiv forms of government; that when equality and equal opportunity are open to all, there would be no God's poor nor government's poor."

Permit me to giv a fact from out of the crucible of my own experience to corroborate the declaration of the tyranny of our boasted liberty-loving government. From losses by fire and in mines we hav in the past few years been reduced from affluence to penury. This so prostrated my husband's mind that he was sent to the insane asylum for nearly a year, while I was left among strangers in Idaho, where I had gone to aid in the mining venture. I succeeded in getting him released from the asylum and we came to reside in the foothills of the Sierras. Having little means, he went upon a vacant forty acres of government land and cut some timber for the purpose of firewood and for subsistence. Now the United States government demands more pay than the land and all on it is worth. How is this for "protection?" How are the poor to help themselvs and be able to support such a government? Does this look as if a poor man is aided by government, or rather that he is robbed of the last penny of his hard earnings?

Governments may do for the rich, but for the workingmen they are, like Sinbad's Old Man of the Sea, to be shaken off the shoulders of those getting weary of their oppressiv load. L. HUTCHINSON.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $10—$3 for renewal to the dear old TRUTH SEEKER; $2 for the "Pictorial Text-Book;" "Is This Your Son, My Lord?" in cloth, $1; "Men, Women, and Gods," cloth, $1; "The Universe Analyzed," by John R. Kelso, cloth, $1; for the balance of $2 send me different kinds of tracts which will do effectiv work. I will distribute them gratis.

The Pacific coast is well represented with Infidels and Freethinkers, Puget sound in particular, but it is a hard matter to induce people to patronize Liberal papers. I am confident that four-fifths of the people in and around West Ferndale are Liberal in their heart, but not in their work.

Last week I had the honor to make the acquaintance of Mr. Samuel P. Putnam, of San Francisco, the champion of Freethinkers on the Pacific coast. He gave us three lectures in Wheeler's Hall. Each and all were well attended. His texts were: first evening, "Church and Church Taxation;" second evening, "The Bible;" third evening, "Evolution and Creation." Well, sir, if the people in this community hav ever been aroused from their slumber it was during the stay of Mr. Putnam. Mr. Putnam has made a host of warm friends during his short stay, and had to partially promis the Ferndaleites to call again in September next. Well, dear Freethinkers, if each state on an average had two such well-informed, good-meaning men as Mr. Putnam is, that would giv lectures from place to place, then we might consider our republic, and our principles of rights, saved.

The churches are organized throughout the Union, and if we do not organize likewise, then our Declaration of Independence, liberty, and rights will be trampled under their feet.

On the second evening I induced Mr. Putnam to organize a Secular Union at this place. He said he would try what he could do, and on the third evening seventeen pledged their names to a petition attached to the Nine Demands of Liberalism. We will soon organize; all we need is a leader.

I am in possession of some TRUTH SEEKER copies published in 1874, while D. M. Bennett stood at the helm.

Well, I will close, with a vote for the pictures.

Yours fraternally, WM. BAER.

VERSAILLES, IND., July 6, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: While others are discussing Spiritualism and other subjects, I propose to come to the front with a new invention for the relief of ministers in the country towns and villages. This idea or invention was suggested on last Sunday evening, while my family were reading THE TRUTH SEEKER and Ingersoll's latest remarks, when one member suggested that one of us write something for THE TRUTH SEEKER. The silence which followed this remark enabled us to hear a Baptist preacher in one of our churches located about a block away from our house. This preacher was making an unearthly noise, hollowing, roaring, and yelling to a few females of both sexes. This noise suggested to us that a machine could be invented to save so much hard labor on the part of the preacher, for it is proverbial that the parson does not like to work. So we invented the following machine. This valuable instrument is wound up when the meeting begins, and is started off by touching a key, just as the choir finishes the opening exercises. The machine runs down in just one hour, during which time it makes some of the most excruciating sounds that ever mortal ear listened to—thumping, screeching, yelling, howling, and sometimes, but just for an instant, coming down to the plaintiv and mournful; then rising again to noise resembling thunder when very near. A part of the machine consists of a huge horn, blown by six of the choir. This horn is twelve feet long and four feet in diameter at the mouth. By this it will plainly be seen that the machine is made to resemble the parson as much as possible. This horn is an accompaniment to the machine proper, and it produces "dire sounds, as erst blew down old Jericho's substantial town."

The way they serve God in our town is very hard on the preacher, but with our machine we expect to make the service easy and much grander, and of course more acceptable to the Lord. We see and fully understand that the best church service is the one that makes the most noise and possesses the most brass; therefore our machine, with all its attachments, is of pure brass.

We also hav a brass dragon, Satan, apollyon, or angel of the bottomless pit (just as suits the taste) attached to the machine, who switches his tail, bows, and opens his mouth and puts out his tongue, at the proper times when he is hard struck, and where it is proper to indicate the pathetic parts of the sermon.

We think this invention will be a relief to parsons generally. Wonder if our friend Heston will not be kind enough to illustrate our patent for the benefit of the Christian world? We firmly believe that the times are ripe for machinery to spread the gospel, and that the old and hard way of serving the Lord should be supplanted by our grand invention.

Hoping THE TRUTH SEEKER will long prosper, we remain,

Yours for Universal Mental Liberty,

ADAM STOCKINGER.

LEXINGTON, KY., July 11, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: When we hear of the rapid sale of suburban lots we cannot but wish that good will be brought out of an enterprise so popular and successful. Is it wise to sweep property thus carelessly into hands not pledged to conduct the business for the general good? It would be wrong to restrict capitalists in this respect by legislation, before their kind feelings hav been appealed to, for no doubt if prudential suggestions were made to them they would readily acquiesce in any plan designed for the future good of those citizens who hav not been able to purchase lots, even at a low price. I think no one will deny that every fifth lot or township should be reserved and held sacred to the use of the unfortunate or toiling thousands who at the present time are laboring for the public, with no assurance that they hav an equal right with others to the advantages of their own country. Public men, hesitate no longer, but offer to your poorer friends what seems naturally to belong to them—a lot or even an apartment where they can enjoy the ordinary liberties of life, without stifling restrictions or dictation, which are always harrowing to the lonely and depressed.

Is the luxury of advanced thought appreciated at Chautauqua, and are lecturers badly off for a subject, when they are obliged to resurrect Moses for the delectation of an audience, and abuse and demolish the Spiritualists to the extent of their ability?

The Spiritualists are advancing civilization, let their opinions be what they may. They do not hold Moses in the highest estimation or suppose that a murderer could hav power with a God to bring water from a rock. They do not look calmly on while their children insult the aged and weary. Neither do they boast of helping the poor while these helpless ones are abroad in the burning heat trying to get work, their wretched clothing exciting the contempt of wealthy Christians. Some of their ungraceful language at Chautauqua with a Mr. Page, who is made to eat sandwiches, also illustrates the tender success of Christians. They also fed their friends on terrapin, lined with salamanders.

Oh, what a Christian civilization we hav, exposing a criminal to a lightning stroke instead of the rack, boot, wheel, or thumbscrew, when a bowl of hemlock would cause an inglorious death, but painless and calm, like that of Socrates.

When the mind falls languidly back upon defeated principles evolution is arrested, which is the energy of nature and not God. The go-ahead faculty is all that givs conventionalities, fashions, and customs power to resist temptation, to long for purity instead of pleasure—which induced some good gentlemen of the ninth century to interpolate into the Old Testament the marvelous words, "Without holiness no man shall see the Lord." The Chautauqua philosophers suppose that nature furnishes force, but that reason implies a kind of magic, although the brain and nervous system work like any other battery, the energy produced being dynamic and nothing else. Who Does "Forbid Investigation?"

BARRE, MASS., July 9, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Permit me to ask a question or two of James Beck, who writes in THE TRUTH SEEKER, July 4th, page 426, "Who Dare Forbid Investigation?"

Who wants to forbid investigation, or who has forbidden investigation?

Any brother or sister member of the Brotherhood of Moralists has the right to "investigate" all he or she desires, and if dissatisfied with our principles and purposes to withdraw their membership. There was no compulsion in their joining us and there will be no compulsion in their leaving us.

I see that my communication, March 21st, on Spiritualism, which was also a severe and just criticism at the Brotherhood of Moralists, was a shot that hit them so hard that it made some of them flinch.

Who was hit? who flinched? Please giv their names. Was it the officers of the Brotherhood, the propaganda committee, or any member of our order? Speak out. I think whoever it was can bear to hav their names made public. Perhaps it was M. L. Salter.

I forward a copy of the constitution to Mr. Beck, that he may not longer continue in ignorance of what is subjected to his "severe and just criticism."

In THE TRUTH SEEKER, June 27th, page 403, M. E. Lazarus opens up pretty strong against "the Ella Gibson Brotherhood of Moralists and M. L. Salter." In the July number of the Independent Pulpit there is another slur or accusation by "Edgeworth." As the two latter are the same person, I will notice them conjointly. The Pulpit declares:

Certain narrow-minded Agnostics, "a Brotherhood of Moralists," for instance, are intolerant of Spiritualists. [Why not add, intolerant of Christians, polygamists, and free-lovers?] Giv to such power, and with Comstocks for presidents, they will revive the Holy Inquisition under some secular name.

Has "Edgeworth" any right to make such an unqualified assertion? It proves he has read our constitution to no purpose, or that from malice, or some other equally cruel motiv, he desires to mislead the public; for Article III of the constitution of the Brotherhood reads thus: "We hold it to be self-evident that enlightened human reason untrammeled by prejudice is the highest tribunal known to man, and that every rational being has an inalienable right to investigate and decide for himself all questions pertaining to his present or future welfare." In the face of such an article in our constitution, how any true, consistent Liberal can persist in reiterating that we "forbid investigation" I cannot understand. Put on your glasses, Brothers Beck, Lazarus, and others of like temperament, divest yourselvs of your prejudice, and perhaps you will discover you hav set up a man of straw of your own imagination, and when you hav valiantly knocked him over, you flatter yourselvs that your "just and severe criticisms hit" somebody, and made "them flinch." We still liv fifteen hundred strong. ELLA E. GIBSON.

A Pulpit Bully Chastised.

INDIAN GROVE, MO., July 3, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: The following is a copy of a letter that I addressed to the Rev. W. H. Younger, of the Methodist Episcopal church at Keytesville, Mo., which I think fully explains itself. If you think it of any value, please giv it a place in the "Letters from Friends" department of your valuable paper, THE TRUTH SEEKER. W. C. WALTON.

REV. W. H. YOUNGER, Keytesville, Mo., Dear Sir: At your recent effort at the Centenary church, it seems that, as an apology for not being able to harmonize the many enigmatical problems with which the Christian mythology abounds, you undertake to divert the attention of the audience to the many inexplicable mysteries that exist around and about us. And because we cannot on scientific principles explain the diversified phenomena of nature to the satisfaction of your quizzical ignoramus, and make it clear to his obtuse mind why the same stale theological hash will cause wool to grow over the face and eyes of the stupid, docil sheep and hair or bristles along the curved spine of the beastly, aggressiv boar, you conclude at once that Christianity is a divinely inspired theology, and that the Bible is the word of God and absolutely true in all its utterances, without contradiction or fault.

Now, my dear sir, in order to assist you to a clearer understanding of the infallible correctness of this (Protestant Bible) man-made book, we wish to refer you to the following quotations from holy writ: "If I bear record of myself, my record is not true" (John v, 31). This, you will observe, is the language of J. Christ, spoken with a view of directing the minds of his hearers to the witnesses on which he relied to establish his claims to the messiahship. Now go with me, please, to John viii, 14–18, and we hear Christ speak again, treating on identically the same subject, but under quite different circumstances. Here he declares emphatically: "Though I bear no record of myself, yet my record is true. . . . I am one that bears witness of myself." On another occasion this same immaculate Jesus, wishing doubtless to magnify his great importance as a ruler, lawgiver, and king, assumes the prerogativs of supreme judge, and in the exuberance of his spirits declares, "The father judgeth no man, but hath committed all judgment unto the son. . . . As I hear, I judge" (John v, 20–30). Subsequently he seems to hav modified his claim somewhat. Hence in John xii, 47, he says: "If any man hear my words, and believe not, I judge him not. I came not to judge the world, but to save the world."

Thus you can see that by reading carefully, "comparing spiritual things with spiritual," and putting together fragmentary utterances of speech as spoken by J. Christ and other divinely inspired writers at different times and under different circumstances, we find that holy writ abounds in falsehoods and contradictions so palpable and plain that no careful student can fail to note them while pursuing his investigations and research. But alas! how many, oh, how many hav the courage to defy the malice and vindictiv rage of the ignorant and superstitious, and be true to their honest convictions and boldly proclaim to the world their ultimate conclusions?

But you undertake to arrest the doubt that involuntarily springs up in the inquiring by an appeal to the alleged fulfillment of the prophecies. As a class these prophecies are all so vague and indefinit that they apply to one person as well as another. I could extend my criticism to each individual quotation to which you referred, and show conclusivly that the language had no more reference to Christ than it had to Alexander the Great, Mohammed, Joseph Smith, or W. H. Younger of Keytesville, Mo. But this would be superfluous, as no one understands this fact more thoroughly than yourself.

Anyone who doubted that it only requires a passing zephyr to fan into a burning flame the spirit of the Holy Spanish Inquisition that ever slumbers in the breast of the religious fanatic, had only to witness in you the personification of a veritable Torquemada as you dilated on the expeditious Sam Jones method of silencing Infidels by "mashing their mouths." This favorit method of extirpating heretics was doubtless inspired by the following, from the immaculate lips of him who spake as no well-disposed man ever spake, "Bring hither these mine enemies that would not that I should rule over them, and slay them before me." These parties, it seems, hav objected to being ruled. They love freedom and spurn the usurper's power. And for this they are doomed to die. Slay them before me, says the blessed Jesus, as I cannot forego the exquisit pleasure of seeing them laid cold in death at my feet. You assert that that method will take the "Infidelity" (life) out of them instantly. You recommend this method doubtless because you know that in times past it has been successful in taking the Infidelity (life) out of countless heretics who hav had the manhood to express their thoughts in defiance of the malevolent hatred of the lamb-like followers of Christ.

"Ninety-nine skeptics recant on their death-beds." So say you. Why do you talk thus? You know that the alleged Infidel, that recants on his death-bed, is not an unbeliever at all. Oh, no! he believes in the Christian's God, his devil, his heaven, and his hell, but his faith did not possess the virtue requisit to the development of an honorable, upright man. Being ashamed of his faith, he was a hypocrit all the days of his life. No honest Infidel fears your scarecrow of a devil; neither does he fear to face the scorn of his imps incarnate.

Now in conclusion, allow me to thank you for being so considerate as not to send my former letter to the St. Louis Republic for publication. In that event I should hav been perfectly humiliated, and crushed as effectually as though the Sam Jones method had been employed.

I should not hav addressed my second communication to you had you not seen fit to allude to the "fellow that wrote you a letter the other day wanting you to giv him light," from the pulpit, in a sneering, Christ-like intonation, as though your clerical dignity shrank at the idea of undertaking to giv a little light on the complex question of human destiny to one that subscribed himself as an earnest searcher after truth.

We hope you will not think it unkind or discourteous on our part in thus obtruding ourselvs on your attention. You know that should his satanic majesty cease to stir up opposition, ecclesiastic bigotry, and intolerance, the cleric guild would soon find itself stranded on the sands of perpetual desuetude and eternal oblivion. Eliminate from your creed the idea of an omnipresent, infinit fiend; dispel the horrid incubus of an eternity of pains for the majority of mankind (to do this is my aim) and your occupation is gone, world without end. Though I would rend the systems of which you are the chosen champion and exponent, I owe you no ill will personally. I subscribe myself your well-wisher and friend. Respectfully, W. E. WALTER.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for his Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

The Meeting of the Winds.

NORTH WIND.

I come from a land of dusk and snow,
Where the cold sun dimly shines,
Over the mountains of ice I blow
And wail through the stunted pines.
I hav seen a party of starving men
Hopelessly waiting for death;
I hav felt a sudden pity for them
And chilled them to rest with my breath.

SOUTH WIND.

I come from the land of burning sand,
Where the lion roves at will,
Where the savage chief leads out his band
And the joy of life is to kill.
I hav followed the tiger's stealthy tread
And watched the spring of the tawny beast;
The negro's children might lack for bread,
But the tiger's cubs had a bloody feast.

EAST WIND.

I come from the land of cinnamon groves
And stately date-palm trees,
And the blossoms white of the scented cloves
I hav tossed in a gentle breeze.
I hav roved at will where the nightingale sings
In the grove by the temple near;
I hav paused a moment by sacred springs,
Their mystic music to hear.

WEST WIND.

I come from the far-off sunset land
Where the new world meets the old,
Where the orient stretches out its hand
The good of the west to grasp and hold.
I breathe a hymn to the white-winged ships,
I laugh through the islander's sea-girt home,
Where the coral reef to the ocean dips
And the waves are white with the crested foam.

ALL.

We hav roamed the world from south to north,
From the west land far to the east,
Seen all that the skill of man brings forth,
His greatest works and his least.
But he comes not yet to his noblest hour,
His life yet runs on the ancient plan,
"That they shall take that hav the power,
And they shall keep that can."

SHARLOT M. HALL.

Patriotism and Christianity.

Last night, in Dr. Gunnison's church (Universalist), the subject before the Young People's meeting was "The Relation of Patriotism to Christianity." The young man in charge did well in opening the theme by defining patriotism as something more than love for one's own country; that it included the general principles of morals, without which no country could be successful, and that true success meant much more than property accumulation and military aggrandizement. The other speakers mostly maintained that nearly all the good graces of Uncle Sam were due to his having been nursed in the lap of Puritanism; one claimed that to the church belonged the teaching of morals, whilst the schools should be left to wrestle solely with the mathematical and material sciences.

Upon the D.D.'s invitation, yours to please took up the slack of time in this wise:

"The verse just sung says that the time shall come when liberty shall not hav an an enemy, and love will be the only bands. Whether or not that condition of society will ever occur I shall not attempt to decide, as I am neither a prophet nor yet a prophet's son to foretell what shall and what shall not be done; but, according to the teachings of evolution, events tend in that direction, and that blissful consummation will therefore probably some time be reached if the peopled world wags long enough. At least, we can all of us thus pleasantly hope, provided we hav much of the hope faculty fashioned in us. And if that pearly age should arrive, then we, or whoever shall be living, will not be much bothered by religion or pestered with politics; for if love is our only band we shall not need other rules of conduct than a knowledge of each other's needs and the means of supplying them. The best quality that has ever been claimed to belong to any religion, is love itself.

"Whether or not Christianity be compatible with patriotism, or either one a part or assistant of the other, depends upon the definition given to these two terms. I do not care to enter into a discussion of technicalities or criticism of phraseology, and I hav not the time if I thus desired. But I will briefly say this: To me it seems that the patriotism is but fragmentary which looks only to the aggrandizement of one's own land, which seeks the quickest way to the wealth of one's own people, without regard to the rights and welfare of each and all on whatever quarter of the globe. For the nation as for the individual, it is not good policy, even, to try to grow rich regardless of any man's right, to acquire something without rendering an equivalent, for then, sooner or later, to the individual, the evil done to another will react upon the doer, and the wronged will, by being thereby made an enemy, seek restitution or revenge, and all his friends will join in the contest. Besides, what is worst of all, while a man or a people may be plundered of their goods, the spoiler in his pilfering robs himself of what is most valuable to himself—his own honor.

"My motto is that of the man who has been most heartily hated and vituperously vilified of any American, born or naturalized, the one who first wrote the name 'The United States,' and who did more than any other to bring to pass American independence. I refer to Thomas Paine, who repeatedly said, 'The world is my country, and to do good is my religion.' His country is my country, and his religion is my religion, if we may be allowed the adoption of the word. If anybody has a bigger country than that, they hav a country too big for my occupation, and if anybody has a better religion than that, they hav a religion too good for me to put in practice; and an impracticable religion, like an impracticable legislation, I cannot conceive to be of any account; and I am not equal to the contract of doing more than the best that I can for such of mankind as I know of on the earth.

"If Christianity be defined as a compilation of the ecclesiastical institutes of the ages, if it be held to be the bondage of the dogmas of theologians, the assent to the abstract speculations of metaphysicians, if it be the uncritical and credulous adherence to the traditions handed down from the buried dead, unverified by our own living experience, if it be the authority assumed by the priests as the agents of far off gods, and receivers, conservers, and interpreters of extramundane intelligence, then Christianity is something that we are much better off without, or, at the best use it could be put to, it might, like the fox-and-geese and the checker-board, serve to amuse an idle hour.

"This government of ours, the American republic, for which we are asked to be patriotic, was made without much reference to the gods or the ghosts, to the priests or to the churches. Whilst to the gods and ghosts, to the priests and churches, were accorded in our Constitution all the liberties and protection compatible with the rights and freedom of the people, the lovers of liberty warn them, from the least to the greatest, to keep their hands off our charter, their fingers out of our chest, for more than what they can get outside of the rights and liberties of the meanest and lowest man breathing, no church, no priest, no ghost, no god has any business to hav. The only true patriotism, as I espouse it, is commensurate with universal justice, and if we can hav that without religion, and hav it proceeding from the sentiment of humanity, then we do not need Christianity, which claims that the greatest of all is charity; and if we cannot hav charity or human affection without Christianity, why, then what is Christianity but another name for complete patriotism?"

JOHN PRESCOTT GUILD.

Worcester, Mass., July 6, A.S. 291.

Origin of Well-Known Words.

Indirectly our word dollar depends upon a saint's name. The word is an abbreviation of Joachimsthaler, a coin first minted about 1518 in the valley of St. Joachim, Bohemia. The valley (thal) bears the name of the saint.

Boycott is a word recently introduced, but already in use everywhere. A few years ago Captain Charles Cunningham Boycott, an Irish farmer and land-agent, angered his tenants, and in revenge they refused to work for him or to sell him food. To boycott means to withhold custom from a man in any line of business.

A martinet is what few soldiers like to be called. Colonel Martinet was an officer in the army of Louis XIV. He was so particular about small details, so rigid in his disciplin, that he was looked upon as a nuisance. His name has come down to us as applicable to a military Miss Nancy Finniken.

Bogus is the corrupted form of the name Borghese, that of a noted swindler who passed large amounts of counterfeit money in the West some years ago.

Boniface is the common name for the landlord of a tavern. The original was one of the rare kind—a sleek, good-tempered jolly landlord—but he was not in real life. He was a character in Farquhar's comedy of "The Beaux' Stratagem," written in 1707.—Harper's Young People.

Concise.

A teacher in a suburban school gave her pupils twelve minutes in which to write an "abstract." A shoe was the subject selected by her, and the boys were to write in the first person. No limit as to the number of lines or words was given them.

Most of the boys wrote and erased during the whole time allotted, but the teacher noticed one fellow who sat idle until the time was within two minutes of expiring. As the scholars filed out she said to him:

"Brown, did you finish your abstract?"

"Yes, ma'am," he answered.

Curious to see what he could hav written in so short a time she looked over the papers, and found this:

"I am a worn-out shoe, my coffin is the ash barrel, my grave the dump."

She says that almost as firmly impressed on her memory as this remarkable composition is the expression of amazement on the boy's face the next morning when he saw the "100" mark on his paper.—Youth's Companion.

The Silk Threads in Bank Notes.

The paper upon which bank notes are printed is called "distinctiv paper," because used exclusivly by the government for the printing of bonds and notes. The mills where it is manufactured are at Glen Falls, Westchester county, Pa. An agent of the treasury department receives the paper direct from the hands of the manufacturer, and every precaution is taken to keep any of it from being lost.

When this "distinctiv paper" is being made, scraps of red silk threads are mixed with the pulp in a big tank. The finished material is conducted to a wire-cloth without passing through any screen which might retain the silken threads. Next, an arrangement above the wire-cloth scatters a shower of blue silk threads, which fall upon the paper as it is being formed. The side upon which the blue silk is deposited is used for the backs of the notes, each thread being so deeply embedded as to remain permanently fixed. The smooth side of the paper, that in which the red threads alone are seen, is used for the front of the note. Each of these sheets is registered as soon as finished.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. Price 25 cents.

News of the Week.

EPISCOPAL BISHOP COXE of Western New York denounces bicycling as "grossly immodest as well as ridiculous for women." He says that "women on bicycles look like witches on broomsticks." He has been rebuked by favorers of the hygienic advantages of bicycling by women.

SOME believe the secret cause of the Chilian war to be rivalry between commercial firms of England and America.

MATILDA BACELLI, of Lucca, Italy, bedridden with paralysis three years, is announced miraculously cured by intercession of St. Aloysius Gonzaga.

THE French Radicals fear that, now that the Catholic church has recognized the French republic and authorized participation in its politics, republicanism will be clericalized.

SANITATION has reduced mortality in New York city 5 79 per 1,000 in twenty-five years. But under its Tammany-Catholic rule it still has one of the largest death-rates in the Union.

EACH year fewer Catholics graduate from our secular schools and colleges, the "reason of this pleasant fact being," says a Catholic journal, "the number and efficiency of our Catholic colleges and convents."

ON the night of the 24 h ult. a mob gathered before the archbishop's palace in the City of Mexico crying, "Death to the pope! death to the evangelicals! death to the archbishop and to the priests! death to religion! long liv Freemasonry!"

HUGE pilgrimages of French workingmen to the Vatican are preparing.

THE census is assailed by Democrats as being extremely erroneous, and admitted by Republicans to be somewhat so.

COUNT DE HUBNER, ex-ambassador of Austria to France, has written a book in which he says that he cannot see how Italy can withstand the growing sentiment of Catholics in all nations that the pope's temporal power should be restored.

CATHOLICS continually rejoice that in Belgium, which until recently was "impiously and oppressivly governed, as France and Italy now are, by a handful of Infidels," the Catholics hav risen "in their might and by their ballots buried them from power."

THERE is trouble between Rev. Dr. Bacon and the preachers of Waterbury, Conn. He is desired by parishioners, but opposed by preachers because when filling a vacant pulpit last summer he decried them for running away to Europe and leaving the dead without funeral services.

A MEMBER of the Italian house of deputies recently urged that the 1866 law forbids the very existence of a monk as such; but Rudini held that it only proclaimed irrecognition of monkish bodies or of individual monks in any religious capacity, without forbidding them actually to assume that character.

THE scheme to perpetuate foreign national distinctions, in language and otherwise, among our immigrants, will fail of adoption, not through compunction at continuing elements of division and discord in this nation, but because of the unwillingness of American prelates to be supplanted by foreigners.

STATISTICS just issued show immigration 1820-90: England, 6,460 054; Germany, 4,551,719; Ireland, 3,501 683; British North America, 1,029,083; Norway and Sweden, 943,330; Austria-Hungary, 464 435; Italy, 414,513; France, 370.162; Russia and Poland, 356 353, Scotland, 329,192; China, 293 578; Switzerland, 174 333; Denmark, 146,237; other countries, 606,006.

THE shrine of St. Anne de Beaupre continues, according to authoritativ church announcements in Catholic journals, to cure the paralyzed, blind, crippled, and otherwise diseased. Processions in honor of St. Anne, it is stated, hav procured rain in drouth, sailors in the gulf hav been rescued, and a few days ago flames consuming a barn were quenched upon the farmer's wife casting her cross therein and calling on the saint. The miracles number twelve thousand. There are large collections of crutches, and spectacles and glasses, discarded by the healed.

A LIVELY CORPSE.

And it came to pass, as they were burying a man, that, behold they spied a band of men; and they cast the man into the sepulcher of Elisha: and when the man was let down, and touched the bones of Elisha, he revived and stood up on his feet.—2 Kings xiii, 21.

Gems of Thought.

I WOULD hav all intoleration intolerated in its turn.—Chesterfield.

THE fool multitude . . . choose by show,
Not learning more than the fond eye doth teach,
Which pries not to th' interior.—Shakspere.

AMONG men who confound their ideas with words, there must be endless disputes.—Locke.

No man can be saved who does not sufficiently endeavor to find out the truth for himself.—Saml. Clarke.

A PEOPLE which takes pride in the noble achievements of remote ancestors will never achieve anything worthy to be remembered with pride by their remote descendants.—Macaulay.

I STUDIED the history of other religions and the character of their sacred books; and I found Christianity to be the natural development out of the dogmas and traditions of India, Persia, Egypt, Palestine, and Greece.—Robert C. Adams.

NOTHING has so tended to harden the human heart as the doctrin of eternal punishment, and that passage, "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved, and he that believeth not shall be damned," has shed more blood than all the other so-called "sacred books" of all this world.—Ingersoll.

MARK the insolence of the priests, who, in sharing authority with what they call the temporal power, reserve to themselvs all action on the mind, the noblest part of man, and take it on themselvs to reduce my part merely to physical action. They retain the soul and fling me the corpse!—Napoleon Bonaparte.

ONE of the results of the extraordinary tyranny of authority is that words are absolutely distorted from their proper and simple meaning, and are used to express the obverse of their right signification.—Oscar Wilde.

WHERE men of judgment creep and feel their way
The positiv pronounce without dismay;
Their want of light and intellect supplied
By sparks absurdity strikes out of pride:
Without the means of knowing right from wrong,
They always are decisiv, clear, and strong;
Where others toil with philosophic force,
Their nimble nonsense takes a shorter course;
Flings at your head conviction in the lump,
And gains remote conclusions at a jump.
—Cowper.

AN age which has ceased to value impartiality of judgment will soon cease to value accuracy of statement, and when credulity is inculcated as a virtue falsehood will not long be stigmatized as a vice. When two men are firmly convinced that salvation can be found only within their church, and that their church can absolve from all guilt, they will speedily conclude that nothing can possibly be wrong which is beneficial to it. They exchange the love of truth for what they call the truth. They regard morals as derived from, and subordinate to, theology, and they regulate all their statements, not by the standard of veracity, but by the interest of their creed.—Lecky.

WORKS of true merit are seldom very popular in their own day; for knowledge is on the march, and men of genius are the præstolatores or videttes that are far in advance of their comrades. They are not with them, but before them: not in the camp, but beyond it. The works of sciolists and dullards are still less popular, but from a different cause; and theirs is an unpopularity that will remain, because they are not before the main body but behind it; and as it proceeds, every moment increases the distance of those sluggards that are sleeping in the rear, but diminishes the distance of those heroes that hav taken post in the van. Who, then, stands the best chance of that paltry prize, contemporaneous approbation? He whose mediocrity of progress distances not his comrades, and whose equality of merit affords a level on which friendship may be built; who is not so dull but that he has something to teach, and not so wise as to hav nothing to learn; who is not so far before his companions as to be unperceived, nor so far behind them as to be unregarded.—Colton.

THE Austrian census shows that in the very religious province of Galicia seventy-four per cent of the population can neither read nor write, and only nine per cent can read.

THE Catholic gentleman whose wife leaves him because he won't follow her into a Protestant denomination has but a dubious eternity before him. He seems to be getting his good things in this world.— World.

REV. DR. CUYLER says that in old times, when the Congregational Ministers' Association of Connecticut held a dinner, the place where they dined had so much whisky in it that it smelled like a bar-room.

THE Dublin Express says that the English will learn from Carlow that "the Irish tenant farmer . . . is a puppet in the hands of Roman Catholic priests and as unfit to be an elector as if he were an infant or a lunatic."

SAYS Rev. Dr. Plumb, of Boston, of Sunday newspapers: "If every man would undertake to read these great Sunday journals regularly, public worship would hav to go, the baser elements in society would become dominant, and the republic itself would be in danger."

GEORGE E. WARING, JR., says: "Disease is not a consequence of life; it is due to unnatural conditions of living—to neglect, abuse, and want." And Dr. Stephen Smith says: "Man is born to health and longevity; disease is abnormal, and death, except from old age, is accidental, and both are preventable by human agencies."

IT is said that Postmaster General Wanamaker spends his entire salary on his private secretary and the various agencies furnishing newspaper clippings. He subscribes to three of these agencies, and has given them instructions to furnish him with all clippings relating to himself and to the postal service.

THE price of land in Russia is rapidly falling, and it is impossible to foresee when it will stop. It would be singular if a process of deliberate warfare on five millions of the most industrious and frugal of its people, the Jews, did not make Russia poorer. And the steady fall in the price of land is but one evidence the more of the penalty attending a line of policy which hampers commerce, paralyzes industry, and oppresses agriculture.

HENRY IRVING very properly refuses to take part in a discussion on "the moral influence of the stage," on the ground that the moral influence of the stage is no more disputable than the moral influence of literature. In other words, there are good plays and bad plays, as there are good books and bad books. That there can be anything immoral in a good play well played is too stupid an idea to argue against.

THE thirteen superstition, thinks Belford's Magazine, perhaps arose from the Last Supper. Leonardo da Vinci, in his famous painting on the wall in the refectory of the Dominican convent of Santa-Maria-della-Gracie in Milan, unwittingly, perhaps, gave the first impulse to the superstition in the minds of the ignorant masses who beheld the twelve apostles and the master at table. To see before their eyes the fatal feast itself must hav affected them far more profoundly than could the most eloquent sermon on the subject. In this picture, too, we see Judas in the act of spilling the salt; thus it is fair to presume that both superstitions hav practically the same origin.

NEARLY all physicians and well-informed people generally now agree, states the Brooklyn Citizen, that Americans are much more healthy than they were forty years ago. Part of the gain is due to the improvement of the country in the way of drainage, more to improved sanitation in city and village, but most of all to improved habits. Nearly all our popular amusements now are healthful. Bodily weakness is almost a disgrace among men, and is unfashionable, at the least, among women. In fact, the athletic young woman begins to be sought after.

"THE act of God" is a phrase curiously surviving in law from medieval times, meaning that the act complained of was the work of some unexpected accident for which fallible mortals cannot be held responsible. In a recent case the Supreme Court of the United States used words that seem to imply that as time goes on this plea for escape from responsibility is to be less and less regarded. In deciding an action for damages incurred in a railroad accident the court remarked: "You who know so much about the law of God and the processes of nature must hav foreseen that the earth hanging over that narrow, unprotected cut would be loosened by the rain and brought down upon your track by the law of gravity. Common prudence and ordinary engineering skill would hav prevented such a result, and we therefore hold you, and not God, responsible." This language deserves attention, because it plainly suggests that with the extension of skill and knowledge the responsibility of carriers is gradually approaching that of absolute insurance. In a hundred years from now, comments the Sun, perhaps the plea of the "act of God" will be unknown in our courts, for by that time science may be sufficiently advanced to provide for every purely material contingency.

THE discussion in Parliament over discontinuance of payments to church schools in England, which now receive state funds the same as public schools, has called attention to a passage in a catechism now in use in church schools in Essex: "(Q.) We hav among us various sects and denominations who go by the general name of Dissenters. In what light are we to consider them? (A.) As heretics; and in our Litany we expressly pray to be delivered from the sins of 'false doctrin, heresy, and schism.' (Q.) Is, then, their worship a laudable service? (A.) No; because they worship God according to their own evil and corrupt imaginations, and not according to his revealed will; and therefore their worship is idolatrous. (Q.) Is Dissent a great sin? (A.) Yes; it is in direct opposition to our duty towards God. (Q.) How comes it, then, in the present day that it is thought so lightly of? (A.) Partly from ignorance of its great sinfulness, and partly from men being more zealous for the things of this perishing world than for the Lord of Hosts. (Q.) But why hav not Dissenters been excommunicated? (A.) Because the law of the land does not allow the wholesome law of the Church to be acted upon; but Dissenters hav virtually excommunicated themselvs by setting up a religion of their own, and leaving the Ark of God's Church."

How to Make Freethinkers of the Young.

From the Freethinkers' Magazine.

In my address before the Portsmouth congress of the American Secular Union, last October, I said:

"My great concern is, how shall we reach the young? How shall we save them from falling into that religious superstition which puts the cross higher than their moral duty as good citizens, and which teaches them to consider what the church sneeringly calls 'mere morality,' as of little account in the sight of the deity whom they worship? How shall we fire them with a desire to make an heroic stand against the iniquitous union of church and state? How shall we fit them to take the vacant places in the Liberal ranks—places left vacant almost monthly by the death of our gray-haired veterans?"

The work of Freethought to-day is perhaps divisible into three sorts: (1) the protest against religious superstition, and especially against the union of church and state; (2) industrial reform; (3) the relations of the sexes, including a study of the laws of heredity, scientific marriage, the divorce question, etc. Nos. 2 and 3 are rapidly crystallizing into well-defined theories; but even advanced Radicals can hardly be said to agree upon any one theory to an extent to warrant its universal teaching to the young. It is quite different with No. 1, on which we are almost everywhere agreed. Whatever our differing isms, we are, as Freethinkers, thoroughly united in our protest against what we hav come to recognize as Christian superstition; and we also agree in protesting against the union of church and state. Here, then, we hav a well defined belief, which, though negativ, is substantially a creed.

But why is it so important to teach this "creed of Freethought" to the young? Because most of those who work for this phase of Freethought are, by their own showing, elderly men and women, who are not only going down the hill of life, but who are much nearer the end than we should wish such useful people to be. Because the younger men and women are too much interested in labor reform to trouble themselvs over the encroachments of religious superstition. Because, therefore, when some white haired soldier, worn out in the service of Freethought, drops suddenly,

> Like one who wraps the drapery of his couch
> About him, and lies down to pleasant dreams,

there is none to take his place in the ranks. I am glad to note some signal exceptions to this; but, generally speaking, those who fight against religious superstition with any activity, are men or women on the far side of forty; and those who fight with the most activity, are usually on the far side of sixty. It is true that Freethought has gained by this selection of matured intellects for her champions. But she has also lost thereby, in the undue cultivation of seriousness, of materialistic pessimism, and of a passionate reverence for reason, reason, reason, to the almost total ignoring of that emotional culture which only the presence of youthful enthusiasm can supply. It is rare indeed that we find an activ Liberal under twenty-five; almost never do we find one under the age of twenty.

On the other hand, it is from the young blood that the Christian church to-day draws her great support. From babyhood up to manhood and womanhood, she trains them in her ways; and far into old age, they usually render her at least a nominal allegiance. Frequently, it is true, they get their eyes open in middle life, and then they may turn to us; but the church has already sucked the juices of their youthful enthusiasm—those rich juices which should hav gone to nourish truth, not superstition.

What are Liberals thinking of, that they so wantonly neglect the training of the young, while they amuse themselvs by doctrinal squabbles and war-dances in the Liberal papers?

There ought to be established throughout the length and breadth of this land, Freethought Sunday-schools. Every auxiliary of the American Secular Union, every Liberal society, ought to be the nucleus of such a school. If only two children and a teacher can be procured, start with those two children and that teacher. If the teaching be good, the school will grow.

What should be taught in such Sunday-schools?

If those supporting the school are all of one ism, of course that ism should be the doctrinal teaching of the school. But if they hold differing isms, those isms should one and all be presented to the children, just as they would be presented to the grown people's Liberal debating society, and under just as strict parliamentary rulings, allowing each side as fair a chance as the other, and forbidding all personalities. What is Liberalism worth, if it does not train our children to think for themselvs, and to seize upon the truth wherever found? And if such open discussion brings your child to think differently from yourself, are you a true Freethinker to object? What if he comes to think favorably of Atheism, when you are a Theist, or favorably of Spiritualism, when you are a Materialist, or vice versa? If you hav truths on your side which those who believe differently from you take no cognizance of, you hav only to present them to your child, and he will be all the quicker to appreciate those truths because of the mental training he is undergoing. And if you be a genuin Freethinker, you will say that it matters little what particular phase of Liberalism your child favors for the time, so long as he is being trained to seek for truth, and only truth, with all the ardor of his being.

I believe that I to-day owe the foundations of my Radicalism to the fact that I was accustomed, as a child, to listen to the grown folks debating theological questions and so I came to see that such questions might hav more than one side.

Certain subjects should be emphasized in Freethought Sunday-schools. If the plan outlined here seems too extended in scope, remember that I giv it as a suggestion only, and that it need not be carried out in its entirety.

1st. The evil that religious superstition has been to the world, from the days of savagery down. One could begin with inner Africa or the South Sea islands, and show the absurdities and barbarities of fetich and idol worship. Then sketch the leading mythologies of the world—Egyptian, Hindoo, Greek, Roman, Norse, Saxon—expanding or abridging, according to circumstances. A passing familiarity with the names of the chief gods and goddesses will be of value, not only in the child's literary and art education, but also in studying subject No. 3, dealt with later on in this article. Where a conquering race, as the Romans, left the nativ religion untouched, teach the child to admire and approve that tolerance. Where a new religion was forced upon a people at the point of the sword, as Christianity was forced upon the Saxons by Charlemagne, show the child the great wrong. The history of the Catholic Inquisition is accessible, and is full of romantic and pathetic incidents from which a moral lesson can be drawn, without dwelling needlessly on the horrible details of torture. The burning of Servetus through Calvin's persecution of him; the reign of Bloody Queen Mary; the forced recantation of Galileo; the burning of Bruno; the shocking cruelties of the duke of Alva in the Netherlands; the persecutions of the Waldenses; the odium which the Puritans incurred in England, and their hanging of the Quakers, when themselvs established in power; the witchcraft craze; the upholding by the Christian church of chattel slavery in this country; her repeated declarations in favor of sex slavery; the persecutions of Seventh-day Adventists and Baptists by First day Christians; the absurdities of the American Sabbath Union arguments, and the would-be ecclesiastical tyranny of the God-in-the-Constitution party; the injustice worked by government appropriations to sectarian schools and missions, especially in Alaska and among the Western Indians; these are but suggestions for a plan of Freethought teaching that could be expanded indefinitly.

Of course, to be perfectly fair, it will be necessary to show the child that religious superstition has not always hindered humanity; that it has, on the contrary, frequently been a stimulus to noble work. How far this usefulness of religious superstition has counterbalanced the evil it has wrought, may safely be left to the teacher and the children for mutual discussion. The more light turned upon this matter, the better.

2d. But we must be careful not to bring pictures of cruelty and bloodshed too persistently before the minds of children, lest they grow morbidly eager to hear of revolting deeds. These matters should be but secondary to a far more important theme—the good to be gotten out of this life, right here and now, without waiting until we die. "One world at a time," should be the teacher's text. The interest, the beauty, the joy of this earth-life, as promulgated by Liberalism, should be forcibly contrasted with the gloom which Christianity has for centuries cast over the earth; and the child should be taught that one of his first duties is to be cheerful himself, and to help other people to be so. Show him that Liberalism is, before all, a religion of sunshine. Teach him the sacred duty, as well as the good sense, of his keeping the body, mind, and heart exquisitly clean and free from whatever tends to blunt their sensibilities. Show him that evolution, and not special creation, is the law under which the universe always works. The teaching of this modern gospel of evolution should be supplemented by brief talks on geology, astronomy, plant and animal life, etc. Contrast the silence of the Christian scriptures upon the rights of animals, with the eloquent pleas in their behalf found in pagan scriptures, especially in the sayings and doings of Buddha; show the child that the first man in America to move in preventing cruelty to animals was a Freethinker (Mr. Bergh); show him that the growing tenderness toward animals in civilized countries, is chiefly due to the spread of Darwinism, with its teachings of the blood relationship existing between the inferior creatures and ourselvs. When once the child has realized the fact of this relationship, it will be easy to prevent him from that wanton destruction of plants and the smaller animals, which seems natural to most young children. It will be easy to make him understand that every living creature, however insignificant, has a right to its life unless it has to be killed for food, clothing, etc., or because it is noxious to the life about it, or because it is so crippled that it is only mercy to put an end to its sufferings.

Where the right sort of a teacher can be found, I think that the child's duty to himself and others, sexually, should be at least outlined, in private talks between himself and the teacher. Still better, I think, would be instruction on such matters in class, provided the teacher possess dignity, tact, and the ability to deal with his subject from a purely impersonal and scientific standpoint. The talks about plant and animal life, in the hands of an experienced teacher, will giv a most excellent foundation for this instruction. Even a chance word, judiciously uttered, may be all-sufficient to start the youthful mind on the right track, where it can think out a clean and unselfish theory of sexuality for itself. It has been the disgrace of Christianity, that it has taught mankind to despise the body, and especially the sexual nature, as something too impure to be talked of casually, much less talked of sufficiently to be developed to a higher plane. Shall Liberals follow in the footsteps of the monkish promulgators of Christian superstition?

3d. The proper study of the Christian Bible is one of the most important subjects of the Freethought Sunday-school. While it is but simple justice that the Bible should not be read as a religious authority in the public schools, supported, as those schools are, by the money of Freethinkers and churchmen alike, it is the hight of absurdity to expect to oust the Bible from its present place in literature and art. To destroy it utterly—if such a thing were possible—would be to throw away the key to thousands of works in literature, painting, sculpture, architecture, and music, whose tendency is undeniably elevating. Its loss would be irretrievable to scholars and poets. But (and mark you this!) it should be relegated to its proper place as a storehouse of precious myths. Its stories and sayings should be recognized at their true value, as the attempts of a primitiv people to fix the floating legends of ancient sun, moon, and star worships, of tree, phallic, serpent, and fire worships, into some definit form—in some cases, perhaps, as a vehicle for the moral teachings of that day, but not always for any useful purpose at all, but simply to gratify their own crude imaginations. Looked at in this way, the bewildering vagaries of the Bible take shape and coherence.

It is true that there are many gross indecencies in the Christian Bible. But so there are in the early editions of Shakspere, and, indeed, in the works of most classical authors. To be consistent, those Liberals who would exclude the Bible from a place on their shelvs for this reason, would hav to narrow their libraries to a compass beside which the library of the most sanctified Comstockian bigot that ever breathed would be wide indeed. To denounce the Bible wholesale for the sake of its coarse passages I consider to be neither honest nor scientific.

It is not honest, because there are many passages of a high and beautiful morality between its covers; and even admitting that those passages hav been borrowed from earlier writers, as is the fact in many cases, still the original sources are not generally known to the public, and their demonstration frequently requires some research and trouble. And is a diamond less a diamond because found in a mud-puddle?

Neither is the wholesale denunciation of the Bible scientific. Such objectionable passages as exist, if read by the light of folk-lore, usually resolve themselvs into primitiv expressions of reverence for the sexual nature as sacred. The true scientific attitude in such matters is to face this fact, not to shrink from it. The Christian Bible is a curious old book, and worthy of the most scholarly study that Liberals can put upon it.

Moreover, let us not forget that this book could not be shut away from our children, even if we would hav it so, as there is a copy in nearly every household in the land. It even lies on hotel tables and in other public places, accessible to all. To forbid it to our children would but quicken the youthful curiosity. I know of a case where two little girls sat in a hotel parlor one Sunday afternoon innocently absorbed in reading the hotel Bible together, when they were accosted by two boys of their acquaintance, with the jeering remark that if the girls knew what dreadful things were in that book, they guessed they wouldn't sit there reading it. Sequel: Indignation on the part of the girls, demonstration by the boys of the truth of their statement, and a subsequent competition between the two boys and two girls, as to who could lay their finger on the vilest passages, supplemented by shamefaced giggles and sly innuendoes.

In how many such instances is not the imagination of the child stained past all cleansing!

Now, there are two ways of dealing with this matter. One is the "thus far shalt thou go and no farther" policy of the church—a policy which has imposed on modern civilization the unnatural teaching that certain organs of the body (created by God himself, think of it!) are impure; that the activities of those organs must not be studied about before they are put into use—at least, not by young women—in the important relation of marriage; that every member of the sex from whom come the mothers of the race must enswathe her limbs with heavy drapery, lest the law of modesty be infringed by the showing of an ankle or the contour of a hip, and that she is the most "feminin" whose limbs are the most cramped by long, heavy, clinging skirts, etc. In short, that the whole matter of sex is so impure, so thoroughly vile, that it cannot be contemplated by the most virtuous without danger of degradation. The other way of dealing with the matter is that of Freethought, which recognizes the fact—the fact, I say—that all processes of the body are equally pure, equally important to be studied about, and equally worthy of scientific, impersonal teaching. Intelligent Freethought recognizes the fact that whatever impurity exists in the Bible has been put there by this unnatural teaching of the church through long centuries, or by her persistently literal interpretation of its stories, as though they were real accounts of the doings of real people, instead of being entirely mythical and allegorical, with no more historical foundation to them than there was to the lately exploded myth of William Tell.

It would be not only possible, but ridiculously easy, for a committee of Liberal mythologists to get up a series of Bible lessons which should explain every word in the Christian Bible as the outcome of a most interesting mythology. And this is what ought to be done by Liberals, if they expect to hav their children hold the Bible stories at their true value—as being upon exactly the same footing with that beautiful sun and dawn myth of Cinderella, with the solar and phallic myth of William Tell, and others. If we would save our children from the persuasions of the church in after years, it is of the greatest importance that they acquire an intelligent comprehension of just what the Christian Bible is—a treasury of pagan folk-lore.

For instance, Cinderella is the dawn-maiden; her envious sisters and stepmother, the clouds and night which try to vail her beauty with the rags of mist; the sun is the fairy prince before whom the dawn ever flees. William Tell is the sun-god, whose far-darting arrows are proverbial; his famous steering of the boat across the storm-tossed lake, is the annual passage of the sun across the waters of winter and night at Christmas; Gessler's cap upon a pole, before which Tell refuses to bow, is a symbol of the more ancient phallic deity. In the Bible, Jacob's twelve sons—as so orthodox a scholar as Rev. Dr. Seiss admits—are prefigured by the twelve constellations of the zodiac. Their sister Dinah is the moon; her adventure with Shechem is but a very innocent occultation of the moon with some bright star.

4th. Last, but not least, every Freethought Sunday-school should encourage its children to join the American Secular Union as soldiers pledged to do battle for the right, for Freethought, and for that secularization of the state which alone can make secure such right. The pansy—or whatever symbol be finally adopted by our people—should be constantly before the young Liberal as the symbol of Freethought, just as the cross is held up before the young Christian. These two ideas—the right to freedom of thought, and the importance of enlistment in the army of the American Secular Union which is contending for that right—should be interwoven with all the instruction.

So shall we beard the lion in his den. So shall we carry the war into Africa. So shall we raise up for the coming generation a well-trained army to do battle successfully against the organized forces of church bigotry.

Perhaps still more important, and, in many cases, easier to start, would be the Freethought lyceum for young people in their teens. Recitations, dialogs, debates, music, theatricals—in fact, any sort of attractiv and mildly improving amusement—can be relied on to bring the boys and girls together. Such a lyceum should become a central exchange for the newest and most interesting ideas; it should be a gay, pleasant place for the young people to come to; and it should invariably hav a sprinkling of grown folks, whose influence shall keep the lyceum alike from the extremes of boisterousness and of tameness—two drawbacks which almost always occur in a society composed exclusivly of the very young. With a little tact and affection on the part of the grown folks, and care in maintaining these societies on a strictly Freethought basis, such lyceums will become the natural recruiting-ground of Liberalism.

In addition to the Freethought Sunday-school and the Freethought lyceum, we need literature especially written for young Freethinkers; and of this there seems to be a scarcity, as most of our literature is adapted only for mature minds. We need books, attractivly written, setting forth Freethought principles; and we need a young people's paper. Nevertheless, if we had our Sunday-schools and our lyceums, the literature would soon spring up to meet the demand.

In conclusion, therefore, I would once more urge on Liberals the necessity which is upon us, to train up the coming generation as stanch Liberals, by means of Freethought Sunday-schools and Freethought lyceums. There is an old couplet which, though time-worn, is well worth quoting here:

'Tis education forms the common mind;
Just as the twig is bent, the tree's inclined.

Money.

I do not believe that the government can make money by law.—Colonel R. G. Ingersoll.

Is it possible that Colonel Ingersoll—Our Bob—is reported correctly in his remarks which hav appeared from time to time in various publications on the subject of money? Does he giv us his views or convictions "honor bright" touching the subject, do you think, or is he like the clergy, bound by his environments to cater to the opinions of privileged classes?

Having read a goodly number of the colonel's works on different topics, I am willing to bank high on his ability to excel any and all writers, living or dead, in a clear comprehension of all subjects upon which he writes that hav come under my observation, save and except the "money question."

His view, as expressed in the above quotation, which "is from a St. Paul dispatch to the Philadelphia Press," not only conflicts with the teachings of all the most advanced speakers and writers, and with the decisions of our highest judicial tribunals; but his statement sounds "queer" to every citizen who is at all posted concerning the government's financial legislation, or recognizes the right of the people to equality before the law. Hence, please allow sufficient space in the veritable TRUTH SEEKER to call his attention to a few bottom facts involved in the subject of "making money by law."

Now, in order to prove "that the government can make money by law," it is only necessary to come to an agreement in regard to what constitutes money. If the idea that money is not wealth, is once clearly established in the mind, that it is public credit, or a check for the delivery or distribution of wealth; none would attempt to argue that Congress, the agents of the people, cannot coin, stamp, fabricate, and make money by law, in the same sense that a person makes a note. Colonel Ingersoll, no doubt, holds to the idea that gold and silver is money. If it is true, that settles it. I cheerfully concede the government cannot make gold or silver by law. But it is not true; that idea, or assumption, has been exploded over and over again. It is the stamp, or impress, of the government, and the law or act of Congress making it legal tender, that constitutes money, and not the material or substance which bears the impress. All standard authorities are in unison on this point.

Hence, when the people's agents coin or stamp money, they simply transfer the nation's credit to the material selected, which by the terms of the legal-tender law must be redeemed in labor and its products. The legal-tender act is the money function, and by its laws for the collection of taxes and debts the government enforces the decree. Regardless of the material or substance upon which it is stamped, money is public credit, a floating perpetual debt, and bears the same relation to the nation at large that a note does to the citizen.

Article I, section 8, of the Constitution, declares "that Congress shall hav the power to coin money." Which is equivalent to the authority to make money, and is a part of our fundamental law. The records of Congress will show conclusivly that in accordance with this decree, on the 2d of April, 1792, Congress passed a law establishing a mint for the purpose of coining money, and from that day to the present time a "mint" of money has been coined, stamped, and by law made a legal-tender.

Thus do we prove not only "that the government can make money by law," but that during the past ninety-nine years it has been off and on engaged in the manufacture of "filthy lucre." Again, in the same dispatch the colonel is reported as follows: "I ask this one question: If the government can make money, why should it collect taxes? Why not make what it needs, and stop bothering the people." Now, it is quite evident from the nature of this query that he sees at once (what I am sorry to say seventy-five per cent of our voting population do not seem to realize) that if the government can make money, it is its obvious duty to make and issue it to carry on its expenses in the line of its present mode of taxation. This, coming from the source it does, is truly gratifying and encouraging to the earnest reformer, for if the F. A. & I. U. can enlist an advocate of the colonel's mental caliber, whose life-long devotion to the cause of truth, justice, and humanity, and eloquent appeal for "liberty for man, woman, and child," preeminently fit him for the position, then, indeed, there will be no such word as fail.

The colonel seems to think the Cincinnati platform defectiv. There are very many who are painfully aware of the fact; hence, it is his imperativ duty to formulate a better one and force it to the front.

Christian Characteristics.

While there are many really good people in the churches, yet they are not good because of the churches, for "A man is a man for a' that, and a' that."

One of the characteristics of the official and officious man who carries the platter, etc., is bigotry, another is envy, and covetousness also is noticeable. These are the natural growth of the church's methods of official education. The most prominent trait of this very useful individual (to the church), however, is Gall, with a great big G.

This is rapidly developed by their eternal system of wholesale and retail begging.

A good collection is a great power in the church as well as in the outer world. I was held up to righteous ridicule publicly once by an antiquated, dilapidated, self-opinionated old oger who held the souls of a certain conglomerated mess of the faithful under the shadow of his wing, because I refused to allow my little daughter (eight years old) to go on the street begging for missionary pennies. Oh, all ye Gods! I call upon you to conjure up from amid the most damnable of earth's practices a more debasing spectacle than a number of little innocent girls sent forth on an errand like this in the name of any or all the Gods.

Another church characteristic is penuriousness. Their motto seems to be, Get all you can, from any source you can, and by any means you can, but giv none of it for any other purpose but the tightening of our cord around humanity.

I hired to a man once to solicit "subs," "ads," etc., for a religious and secular weekly. He gave me a church directory, and I worked among the faithful for two days and nary dollar did I get. They all wished Brother ——— "success," but not $2 worth. He then said that "he saw he would hav to leave it largely discretionary with me how I should work."

I told him I did not know of but one way to ask the public for favors, and that was to put my scheme on its merits, and if it had any, success was certain in this country. I also asked him if he had any tabooed classes. He said no; he would be glad to hav a copy in every saloon in the city. I started out and solicited subscriptions on the basis that "Those people, you know, are proverbially numerous and well heeled, and a small favor shown to their paper [we print a list of new "subs" each issue] will be a paying investment." The result was, I was loaded down with silver dollars in half a day. The old mossback's eyes glistened when I shoveled them out on his desk, and he gasped out, "Why, where and how did you get all this in so short a time?" "By legitimate newspaper work," I replied.

Sequel. He had told me to canvass saloons, and I had $8 of saloon money in the pile. He only knew the name of one of those men; and when I handed him the list of names for publication, he discovered P. Lacey among them and said he could not allow that name to go in. "You will take his $2, print a list of men each side of him, and while you are not asked to do aught except to merely giv his name as a subscriber, you will slap him in the face by leaving it out." "Oh, yes, sir, I'll hav to do it." I then informed him that if the morals of the people were at such a low ebb that just the name of as liberal a man as any town was ever blessed with could materially affect them, then, as my morals were just a little shaky anyway, I could not risk working for it. And thus the religious and secular business and I parted company on the spot, although I did not know where my next sack of flour was to come from. I will not do such work for any money. If a man wants to curse any class of men, let him not ask them for favors, is my motto.

How to Help The Truth Seeker.

1. When renewing get a friend to subscribe and thus save a half dollar apiece.

2. Get your newsdealer to display it on his stand or in his shop window. Be sure that he displays the pictures.

3. Get your newsdealer to keep in stock one or more copies, with your guarantee to take off his hands at the end of the week any that remain unsold. If he exhibits them the pictures alone will sell them.

4. Take a few extra copies and circulate them among your acquaintances. On your request, we will send you back-number sample copies free.

5. Leave a copy occasionally where it will be picked up—in the train, in the factory, in the meeting-room, in the cigar store, in the barber-shop. Leave it picture-side up.

6 Keep in your pocket some of our cheap tracts, and when convenient hand one to a friend.

7. Get a new subscriber by persuading some friend to take it.

A Word to Auxiliaries.

Some time ago, we appealed to our auxiliary societies to show themselvs really auxiliary to the national society by giving it their support, both financially and personally. We suggested that five cents quarterly from each of their members to the American Secular Union would be a suitable money contribution; or, if five cents were found to be too great a drain on the pockets of the members, to make it one cent quarterly.

A few auxiliaries, whose names we giv below, hav responded with contributions for the parent society. The officers of a number more hav written to us, approving the plan, and promising to do what they can to get their members to act favorably thereupon. We could wish that those auxiliaries contributing were more numerous; but, when one considers that absolutely no system of regular contributions from auxiliaries has existed during the fifteen years of our society's existence, we cannot help congratulating ourselvs on the beginning here set forth as a successful one:

Highland Freethinkers' Society, Highland, Ill., through Aug. Jehle, treasurer	$6 25
Boston Ingersoll Secular Society, Boston, Mass., through Geo. N. Hill, secretary	5 00
Massillon, O., Secular Union, through Mrs. Jacob Pitts	2 20
Total	$13 45

Had similar contributions come in from all the societies whose officers hav written approvingly of this plan, the total here given would hav been several times as great.

In connection with this, the following letter from Mrs. Jacob Pitts (not written for publication, but published by her permission) will be interesting:

MISS CRADDOCK, Dear Madam: Inclosed find money-order for two dollars and twenty cents for the American Secular Union from the Massillon Liberals. Fifty cents are from myself, as I was fifty years old yesterday and gave a cent for every year, instead of one cent for each member in the family, as I hav no one but my husband.

It is very kind of you to make me a member of the American Secular Union. I am proud of it, and thank you for the very nice letter.

We did not hav any meetings since March. I collected the money just as I could, when I met any of the members. Hoping you will be encouraged to keep on in the good work, I remain your fellow-member in the cause,

MRS. JACOB PITTS.

No meetings since March, and yet a contribution sent in, all through the persistent efforts of one woman! Verily, such things put to shame those auxiliaries which are meeting right along but which nevertheless quite forget the support they owe to the national society! If the term "auxiliary" means anything, it surely means "a help." How many Liberal societies which to-day claim to be "auxiliary" to the American Secular Union, are in any sense "a help" to the parent society whose charter they hold? How many are doing effectiv local work for state secularization? How many exist to whom we could turn for effectiv help in a local fight involving the principles of the American Secular Union? How many auxiliaries recognize their duty to contribute financially to the support of the national society a regular sum, however small?

Alas, and alas! that I who write these questions should hav to chronicle the abounding weakness of the auxiliary backbone!

It is high time, it seems to me, that something were done to winnow the wheat from the chaff, and to condense from the numerous auxiliaries throughout the country, a fighting force of Liberals which shall be really available for good work. I am in hopes that, at the next annual congress, a move may be made to retain on our rolls only those auxiliaries which contribute to the financial support of the parent society, and which strengthen its national influence by local work for state secularization. But I am also in hopes that, long before that congress, an inherent sense of duty may brace up many of our laggards, and bring them back into the ranks of working, coöperativ auxiliaries. Come, friends, let us hear from those societies among you which really believe in the Nine Demands of the American Secular Union, and which really care to coöperate in the work of state secularization. Whatever other reform work you are engaged in, it certainly behooves you since you hav embarked on the Secular boat, to step up promptly to the captain's office and settle, and also to coöperate harmoniously with the other passengers and the crew. Every auxiliary should be a supporter, financially and with local work, of the American Secular Union.

How many auxiliaries that read this will come forward, promptly and cheerfully, to the support of the present society and thus win a place on the roll of honor as real "auxiliaries" or "helps" in our work?

IDA C. CRADDOCK,
Corr. Sec. American Secular Union.

Reply to Miss Craddock.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I hav tried my best to "coöperate" with the Secular Union. Ida says, "Mr. Jamieson is the early bird who sees the worm, and who, let us hope, also catches it." I hav had no ambition to swallow the Union. I wanted to see a practical plan tried to enlist in the service of the Union all lecturers that chose to work for it. But since reading Miss Craddock's reply to me I am satisfied that this is not the wish of the managers of the Union. Miss Craddock says, "We must insist on our right to use discrimination in accepting the services of such lecturers as may offer;" this, taken in connection with her statement, that there are "bad" lecturers and "indifferent" lecturers, is tantamount to a rejection of my plan; for I, poor, short-sighted mortal, said I wanted all lecturers to be treated alike, "privileges for none;" and I said "I will agree to no plan that will exclude my brother or sister lecturer." Why, then, should Miss Craddock hav called upon Liberals to send in $300 for my services when the terms of my offer were refused?

My views are too broadly democratic for the Union and too indiscriminatingly liberal in the selection of workers for the advocacy of state Secularization and the organization of Secular Unions. That is, it will not do to accept the "services of such lecturers as may offer." Some of them are "bad," others indifferent lecturers. They will be permitted to "mention" the Secular Union, but should never be employed by it. They are not good enough for that! "Were not the words before me in black and white, I would question the fact of such a statement being made by so level-headed" a woman as Miss Craddock. For she says, "What we hav asked, and what we hav a right to expect, I think, is that every [every] Freethought lecturer in the country, whether paid in dollars and cents for it or not, should, when opportunity offers, mention at least the existence of the American Secular Union, as a society organized for the express purpose of state secularization, and holding out a welcome to Liberals of all isms." But do Judge Westbrook and Miss Craddock welcome all Liberal lecturers? "Every Freethought lecturer in the country" is asked to help the American Secular Union; but it does not propose to do anything for them—that is, for any that are "bad" or indifferent lecturers. Only the "good" may apply with the least hope of being accepted, to wit, good talkers. An applicant, however earnest, self sacrificing, sincere, cannot enter into the gates of glory of the American Secular Union, as a hired "field secretary," unless he or she is a good speaker. Says Miss Craddock, "All sincere and earnest people are not equally desirable as speakers." But are not all sincere and earnest people desirable as workers? Is it not a fact that some of the very best speakers are the poorest organizers? And as practical, every-day, business-like workers are they not a failure? How much oratory does it require to "mention" "the existence of the American Secular Union, as a society organized for the express purpose of state secularization," and quietly adding (without the least attempt at eloquence) said Union holds out a welcome, with both hands, "to Liberals of all isms?" This takes them all in, "good, bad, and indifferent." But it is not extended to all lecturers of all isms who believe in state secularization. Says Miss Craddock, "It is manifestly the duty of every lecturer [good, bad and indifferent] who loves the cause, not only to mention our existence, but to suggest the advisability of their audiences coöperating with us." Tread lightly round its couch. When a society, like an individual, begs the world to remember that it still exists, it is nearly dead. The most economical thing the Liberals can do this fall is to bury it in white satin, and place a pansy blossom on its grave. Mr. Wettstein's torch of liberty might be placed at the graveyard gate to keep off ghouls. It was a sweet little thing while it lived; did little harm and very little good. What good it has done is to be credited to the careful nursing of Miss Craddock. The old Liberal League was made up of sterner stuff. It was felt as a power in the land. The church feared, hated, and vilified it.

Our sister says she trusts the Liberals of the country, if they really feel they had rather sustain ten lectures at $300 each than to pay one man $2,000 or $3,000 a year, "will duly send in the necessary $300, which is the price of Mr. Jamieson's coöperation." No, ma'am, my coöperation was as "free as the grace of God." Organizing societies involves extra time and extra expense. If this were not the case, why offer to pay one "field secretary" a large salary for doing this very work?

My offer was made in good faith in order to, if possible, unite all the lecturers in the field, beginning with ten (not with one at $300 nor $3,000), if funds should ever warrant, hoping that all lecturers would be finally induced to join, when assured that part of their actual expenses would be paid from a common fund.

As my plan is not acceptable to the Union managers I will proceed with the single handed, but joyously free and independent method of thirty years, slashing the church that would destroy our nation.

Not only politeness but justice requires that I add this: Ida C. Craddock is certainly one of the most vigorous workers that has ever held the office of secretary of the American Secular Union. She is carrying it through more difficulties than it has ever known. If its life is saved Miss Craddock must save it. In my opinion it can best be done, and most economically, by the Liberals of the country adding $1,000 to her salary (for additional expenses), making $2,000 a year, and hav her go out and be the "field secretary" herself. She could hav her main address in Philadelphia, and travel over the Union giving lectures, organizing societies, becoming better acquainted with the Liberals. She will organize more Secular Unions and do more for the perpetuity of the Secular Union than any five men that can be sent out. I believe a warm welcome awaits her in hundreds of Liberal homes. Her enthusiasm and earnestness are, too, just what the Liberals need to inspire them with ardor in this great work.

Independent Slate-Writing, etc.

BROTHER MACDONALD: In your private letter dated July 22d you say:

Why is it that Keeler wouldn't write for me? Why do all mediums refuse to sit when ordinary precautions are adopted against fraud, when they advertise to get writing under just such circumstances, and allow their friends to blow about them? Find me a slate-writing medium who will get writing without touching the slate and I'll print it big.

Your first question is an abridgment of a statement made editorially March 29, 1890, to wit:

When, however, it was proposed that the conditions be made such that the medium could not hold the slates away out of sight or otherwise manipulate them, the media refused the sittings as one man.

My answer to that at the time was:

In no instance, so far as I know or hav been informed, does Mr. Keeler "hold the slates away out of sight;" but in every instance, I believe, or suppose, he manipulates one or both slates. I apprehend, therefore, that his refusal to allow you a sitting was due to your unreasonable requirement that he should not touch the slates. After he has handled them the sitter is allowed to critically examin and tie them.

It is an error to say that the conditions are imposed by the medium. He is the passiv instrument of an occult power that is often capricious. If he antagonizes his so-called "control" he is likely to lose his mediumship.

My own experience at a second trial of slate-writing was even more wonderful than the first. My questions were all prepared and sealed before I went. Before I put the bit of slate pencil between the slates I carefully looked on both interior surfaces to be sure there was no writing there. I tied them with my handkerchief. After sitting awhile Mr. Keeler asked me to put the slates back of me on the chair. I did so, and in a few moments, at his direction, took them in my hand, untied them, and lo! one was full of writing.

Meanwhile, at his request, I took a third slate, one of his own, on which I knew there was no writing, and held it under the lid of the table, with a bit of slate pencil on it. Mr. Keeler kept both his hands on the table, and never touched that slate after he had handed it to me. Presently I drew it out from under the table-lid, and there was a communication correctly signed by my eldest deceased brother, in answer to my sealed question. And never before had I sought a communication from that brother.

In this instance the medium did not touch the slate, and while I held it the writing came upon it. Nor did he touch the slates behind my back, when the writing came upon one of them.

There is no more observant or critical woman than my wife. A skeptic from childhood, she would not believe in another life but for personal proofs through spiritual phenomena. She went for slate-writing lately a second time. She prepared her questions at home, and took our marked slates. It was 2 o'clock in the afternoon of a bright day and the sitting was before a southern window. Mr. Keeler sat in a rocking-chair on the opposit side of an ordinary table. He did not handle the slates preparatory to the writing. He said they should be washed. She replied that they had already been washed at home. "But," said he, "there are some spots on them." "Those are defects in the slate," said she, "and cannot be rubbed out." Then, reaching over his hand, he placed it on the top slate for a few seconds and withdrew it. "Look," said he, "there is a cat's head." And sure enough there was an excellent outline of a cat's head, about the size of a silver half-dime. It was not there before Keeler put his hand on it, and it is there yet, being indelible, and apparently scratched by a sharp, hard substance.

And that was all the touching done by Mr. Keeler, except when it came to holding the two tied slates for the writing. There was certainly no writing there when Mrs. Burr put the bit of pencil between them herself and tied them together. But in less than five minutes, after waiting nearly an hour for the manifestation, the two interior surfaces were written full of messages. She had brought nine interrogations folded up in wads, which so remained in sight all the time before her; and in the closed slates came seven answers to the secret questions. Meanwhile, Mr. Keeler would anticipate some of the communications verbally, giving the correct names and proper answers.

And now let me submit the testimony of a physician whom I hav known for twenty years past, and who has been practicing in this city (Washington, D. C.) since 1853, Dr. T. Hansmann.

He says that at ten years of age he was an ex-expert sleight-of-hand performer in Germany, and that recently when he witnessed the trick of slate-writing by the magician Kellar, he saw how it was done in a few moments.

Dr. Hansmann was an unbeliever in Spiritualism until six years ago, when he began to investigate the phenomena. He could not believe the possibility of a spirit's return until, after repeated tests, all doubt was removed, and now there is not a more ardent Spiritualist than he.

Passing over his earlier experience, I come down to slate-writing, which began with him only three years ago, through Pierre Keeler. The first time there was no touching of the slates by Keeler until after the doctor had tied them. Then came a second slate-writing, when, he says, Keeler did not touch the slates at all. And one of these first communications was from the doctor's brother in good German and characteristic handwriting.

During the three years past Dr. Hansmann has got more than three hundred slates full of writing, chiefly through Keeler, but many through Dr. Stansbury, late of Boston, and a number through others. And in repeated instances the writing was obtained without the slates being touched at all by the medium from first to last. A dozen times, at least, Keeler did not touch the slates at all, several times Dr. Stansbury did not, and in two or three instances other mediums did not.

Many of these slates are preserved, and the doctor takes great pleasure in exhibiting them every Thursday evening at his office to anybody who wishes to see them. Some of the slates are porcelain and sometimes the writing is indelible.

He showed me a dozen or more book-slates of six pages each, all full of spirit writing and identified by his private mark put there prior to the performances. At the first trial he put the book-slate between two folding-slates. In about twenty minutes he took it out full of writing. Then he treated in the same way three other book-slates, and he says they were all written full in about a minute. The contents he read to me and I inspected the writing. One of them contained one hundred and twenty-three names, many of them apparently autographs of well-known deceased persons.

He also had two small blank books, with his address printed on the covers in gilt, and each one with an ornamental title-page made by a female penman. These books, of one hundred and twenty pages each, are full of messages from the departed, and many of the autographs appear to be genuin. I was especially interested in two communications in short-hand signed William Blair Lord. I was associated with Mr. Lord as an official reporter of the United States Senate from 1850 to 1854. He and I were partners in New York from 1857 to 1865, and we were both on the House corps of official reporters from 1865 to 1869. He died in December, 1884. I hav myself had several messages from him, some in short-hand; and here, to my surprise, in Dr. Hansmann's book I found two more.

The method of obtaining this writing was by wrapping the book in a cloth and waiting for the influence in the presence of Mr. Keeler. And Keeler did not touch the book. It took three sittings to fill the one hundred and twenty pages with messages.

All this is doubtless too marvelous to be credited by half the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, few of whom, I dare say, are greater skeptics than was Dr. Hansmann six years ago; but I beg the toleration of the incredulous while I add a little more.

Some of the book messages are amusing, for example, a pretty fair drawing of a church steeple, with this inscription underneath:

The curse of creation. HENRY WARD BEECHER.

Dr. Hansmann has a little bit of the garment worn by Abraham Lincoln when he died. He planned a secret test with it. Wrapping it up in several layers of paper and taking also his little book, he called on Keeler for a séance. Keeler held the folded paper to his forehead and presently uttered a cry of pain, saying or implying that some one was shot in the head. A little later, and without being told what was in the paper, he said, "The cloth has been taken out." "Then it must be given back," said the doctor. Meanwhile there was the book wrapped up in a cloth, and pretty soon, when the cloth was removed and the book opened, lo! there was the bit of cloth and the following written message:

I herewith restore to you the piece of Mr. Lincoln's coat. It is a painful reminder to me of a sad event in the history of many lives. God and my victim and all the heavenly beings hav forgiven me, but I hav never forgiven myself.
JOHN WILKES BOOTH.

I can testify that some of these messages are written in good Greek, good French, and legible phonography. The German writing I cannot read very well, nor the Chinese, the Japanese, or the telegraphic writing at all.

I hav had messages written in sealed envelopes, through Mrs. W. M. Keeler. I wrote my questions when she was in another room. I laid them in a pile, face downward, on the table. She came and handed me some bits of pencil lead, which, together with the slips of paper containing my questions, I put in the envelope and sealed it. She then went to the cabinet and told me to follow her with the envelope. I took it and sat in front of her. Once she placed the envelope to her forehead, and finally she held it by two corners while I held the other end. It was never for a moment out of my sight, and only for a few seconds out of my hands. I then went back to the table with it, and on cutting it open found other writing than my own on five of the eight slips. There were three answers properly signed. There was one answer "Yes," without a signature. And to my short-hand address to Wm. Blair Lord (his name being also written in short-hand by me), the response was two cross strokes over the writing, and clumsy initials "W. B. L." underneath. A sixth paper contained a hasty sketch of a head, artistically done, but not a likeness of my brother Frank, whom I had addressed for the first time.

Several months later I went for another sitting. The result was much the same, only I got more writing. There were answers properly signed by five of the seven deceased persons addressed. A sixth paper, addressed all in short-hand to my friend Lord, was answered by three lines of pot-hooks. This second attempt to get a short-hand communication from him was unsuccessful, but I hav since received several messages from him at the light and dark circles, some of which are in short-hand.

I could tell more marvels, but I forbear. "Find me a slate-writing medium who will get writing without touching the slates," says the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, "and I'll print it big." I was not sure whether Keeler did not touch the slates at some time during every sitting. That seemed to be a necessary condition. I knew it was his practice to hold on to the tied slates when the writing came, but not always. And now you hav the testimony of a converted skeptic to the fact that occasionally the writing comes when the medium at no time during the sitting touches the slates. And I hav no doubt there are numerous other witnesses to a similar experience. W. H. BURR.

A Correction.

In my article on "A Correct Silver Dollar," in to-day's issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER, a very unpleasant misprint occurred. At about the middle of the first column of the article a passage should read: "In consequence of this fact, the American standard silver dollar has at this writing (July 4, 1891) only a bullion value of from seventy-eight to seventy-nine cents in gold. It, therefore, cannot be considered as correct money, not being, as to its bullion value, an equivalent of the gold dollar, which it should be by law."

In connection with this subject, I beg leave to make a remark on fiat money, which means a paper currency irredeemable by gold or silver. The story of such money is best told by a reference to the so-called continental money, irredeemable bills of credit, issued by the Congress of the United States during the Revolutionary war. The phrase, "Not worth a continental," is well known in this country yet at the present time. A history of the United States I hav before me says:

During the year 1780, Congress was continually hampered in its action by a want of money. At the commencement of the war, the feeble colonies, having no funds at command, had been obliged to issue bills of credit, for the payment of which they pledged the public faith. The cause of liberty required constant advances; and in 1780 it was found that no less than $200 000.000 of continental money (as it was called) was in circulation.

At first the bills passed at par—that is, for the full sum which they promised to pay; but as Congress kept issuing large amounts, which it could not redeem with gold or silver, people would not take them, except at a great discount, or allowance. Thus in April, 1780, one silver dollar was worth forty in continental bills; and soon afterward no less than $75 in bills was given for one in specie. A pair of boots at this time sold for $600 as continental money. [The same was the case with the fiat money of the South during the late war of the Rebellion.] To injure still more the credit of Congress, the British flooded the country with counterfeit bills, which it was impossible to distinguish from those that were genuin. At last no one would take continental money on any terms; those who had it on hand were plunged in the greatest distress, and all business was paralyzed.

History, usually, is a very good teacher.

The Greek Church.

Several thousand years ago the Jews got up a religion which taught them to plunder and murder all their neighbors, and to carry off their women. Sometimes their neighbors made them take their own sauce. But from that religion sprang four others: the Catholic, the Greek church, the Protestant, and the Mohammedan, all horribly persecuting religions when they had the power. The only religion to-day which is unrestrained is the Greek church, and it is as cruel and diabolical in persecuting the Jews as the Jews ever were. If the Catholics, or Mohammedans, or some of the Protestant sects stood in the shoes of the Greek church in Russia, they would do the same thing—only the Catholics would do a great deal worse, having had greater experience in the diabolism of persecution.

It is a pity the poor Jews of to-day must suffer for the sins of their diabolical fathers. It is the power of Voltairism and other Infidel outsiders that has drawn the fangs of the serpent in other countries and saves us from the fate of the Jews.

Lectures and Meetings.

THE next bi-weekly entertainment and reception of the Radical Club will be held in its rooms, 37 Clinton place, Wednesday evening, August 5. These summer-night's festivals afford the only present occasions for social unions of Liberals hereabouts and they are growing in favor.

WE learn from his son's Literary Guide that Mr. Charles Watts has received several pressing invitations to return to England, and to make it his permanent residence. One offer, says the Guide, is of a very important nature, and, should he accept it, an opportunity would be given him to render valuable assistance to the Freethought propaganda which is now being so activly carried on throughout the United Kingdom.

CLERICAL intolerance has lately defeated itself at Waterloo, says the National Reformer, a battle of thought being now in process at the scene of the great battle of bodies. The clerical burgomaster of Waterloo lately caused a dead Freethinker to be buried in the "dog's ditch." The act turned the next communal election against the clerical party; and now a sum of sixteen hundred francs has been collected to raise a monument to the Freethinker's memory. It will be inaugurated on August 2d, at a Freethought demonstration.

THE Ohio Prohibitionists, in their late convention, hav this preamble to their platform: "The Prohibition party of Ohio recognizes God as the source of all just power in government." This preamble completely excludes from the Prohibition party in Ohio any except Christians, says a writer for the National Religious Liberty Association. No man who is Infidel or Atheist in his belief has any right in the party under that platform. And anyone can see that if a political party adopting such principles came into power it would be nothing short of a hierarchy. Infidels and Atheists hav the same civil rights as Christians. What will the Ohio Prohibition party do with such? Will it disfranchise them and still tolerate them in the country? or drive them out? A careful consideration of this subject should lead men to see the foolishness in a political party adopting such principles. The civil power that will not protect all its citizens, regardless of religious belief, who conduct themselvs civilly, resolves itself into a persecuting despotism. They also placed the following plank in their platform: "All men should be protected by law in their right to one day of rest in seven." Why not say it as the advocates for Sunday laws mean it—All men are protected by law in their right to one day of rest in seven, but we want to compel them to rest regardless of either their rights or desires? The same convention passed the following resolution: "Resolved, That we condemn the action taken by the board of control of the Columbian Exposition in opening its doors upon Sunday, and demand that the Congress of the United States shall prohibit such opening upon the Sabbath day." This last will be more timely in 1892, inasmuch as the question of opening or closing the Exposition on Sundays is not yet decided. But the Prohibitionists are nothing if not erratic in their acts and utterances.

Communications.

Recent Gems from the Religious Press.

The Evangelist publishes a letter from Dr. Geo. L. Prentiss wherein he expresses his disappointment at Dr. Patton's action in the assembly in regard to the Briggs veto. He says:

I must confess with sorrow that my faith in him [Dr. Patton] has been fairly put to shame. He had an opportunity to speak a word and strike a blow for justice, for sacred scholarship, for reasonable liberty, both of thought and teaching, etc., etc., and he failed to seize it.

In the domain of religion there is absolutely no mitigation or abatement of man's animal brutality to his fellow-man. On its assumption of its infallibility the church is squarely set against the elimination of the human ferocity which fired the fagots of the martyrs of liberty in the past, and it is in the advance of enlightened Freethought outside of the church that the personal safety of dissenters is assured. The secular law holds us in check. The "animus" which brought men to the stake still livs and riots in the fanatical brains of religious lunatics; it does not burn the heretics as of old, but it reaches the limit of compassable inhumanity by turning them out to starve, or beg, or steal, or mayhap to die of a broken heart. Dr. Prentiss must never expect that a blow for justice will ever be struck by the church. It never has struck one and never will. Let him throw off the ignoble slavery of its teachings and find justice in the open book of eternal nature.

The Living Church (P. E.) says:

It is a time when all orthodox churchmen, whether they call themselvs "High" or "Evangelical," ought to act together, shoulder to shoulder, to stem the tide which is carrying away many of our younger men, and showing itself in various forms within the church. The fundamental body of doctrin, which we hold in common, is far larger than the aggregate of the points about which we differ.

Here is another appeal for solidarity of action against the tide of reason which is submerging "non-essentials," and fundamentals as well, in the deep profounds of echoless obscurity. Buckle on your armor, soldiers of the church, the battle is at hand!

Delinquent reason has risen in her might, and she will prove an invincible yet merciful foe. The gauzy texture of creedal armor is all impotent against the hot shot of the advancing forces of reason and intelligence. Sound the alarm! mass your forces, ye slaves of superstition! Catholic, Protestant, and Jewish, form a united alliance, and place your manufactured god at the head of your allied army. Chattel slavery has long since been routed, mental slavery must be annihilated.

The age of spiritual sham is passing away; mental delusions born of mercenary hypocrisy with a god with a big G as a convenient figure-head, are fading away under the bright light of the rising sun of advancing intelligence.

Beat not a hasty retreat; shun not the conflict; resort not to strategy, but meet the cohorts of reason face to face, and ye shall find their only weapons are but nature's provable truths supplemented by universal love.

The Interior (Pres.) says:

There never was a heretic-burning pope who did not exploit effusiv piety while permitting the murder.

The idea of absolute conformity to creed was inherited from the Roman church, and yet maintained its existence in parts of the Protestant denominations. It is known that no two men see any object, physical or mental, in identical light, or receive identical impressions from it.

To men absolved from dictated lines of thought the uncertainties and divergencies of interpretation of the alleged "word of God" would of itself be enough for an explicit denial of its authenticity.

The absurdity of coupling this "revealed word" with the author of nature, who we are soberly told by the Westminster Confession "made this world out of nothing," is made most strikingly conspicuous when we remember that this alleged "word" is the only incongruous mixture, is the one and only error ever made by the so-called "author of nature." All the rest of his alleged creation seems to hav been made in a thoroughly workmanlike manner. A stone is a stone, water is water, air is air, and so on through the whole realm of visible nature there is no question for argument, no room for doubt. These, let it be remembered, are elementary alleged creations, and are perfect.

Now, does it not outrage the reasoning faculty, and is it not insulting to the alleged creator to suppose for one moment that, having created man, he cannot speak to his creation in an intelligent manner and with unquestionable directness and simplicity? That he has not done so through the medium of the Bible is admitted by religious teachers, and the excuses, the subterfuges that are offered, each and every one are an added insult to their so-called omnipotent God. They are not tenable; they must abandon one or the other. Either there is no creativ God that inspired the Bible or the Bible is from man alone. Take your choice; you must drop one or the other.

The Churchman, in reviewing the late encyclical of the pope most truthfully says:

The principle of distributiv justice in industrial affairs has yet to be discovered: but the pope has not discovered it, and it is not popes who will discover it. Neither will it be discovered by doctrinaires or visionaries.

Popes, doctrinaires, and visionaries hav ever been very chary in disturbing the source of temporal help by which they are supported. The fact of receiving all needful moneys is quite enough for them; as to how or from whom it is raised, they are alike indifferent. Their seat upon the back of labor is quite comfortable, and from it they lecture and slander the poor slaves at their own sweet will. The unveiling of the statue of Beecher in Brooklyn a few days since recalls to my mind a Thanksgiving sermon delivered by him in 1884. In it he claimed that the United States was in a wonderfully prosperous condition, and that harmony pervaded everything. It is a fact that the more narrow the range of observation of our modern orators, the wider and more sweeping are their meaningless generalizations.

To the great Beecher intellect the United States meant Brother Deacon White, Mr. Claflin, Vanderbilt, Sage, Field, Deacon Richardson, et al, and not the majority of the people of the country, for in that year railroad builders were receiving fifty-five cents a day, miners $1; factory hands working fourteen hours for a bare subsistence; woman toilers in this city working day and far into the night for board alone. Do not these workers constitute the best and most important part of the United States?

Then how was it that Mr. Beecher could say with the faintest shadow of truth that the country was abundantly prosperous?

By simply ignoring the existence of these "lower orders" of men, and being deaf and blind to their appeals and pitiful condition under our heartless Christian civilization. Church decked with hot-house plants, the audience well dressed, well fed, the organ pealing forth inspiring strains, the contribution-box filled to overflowing, the negro freed by the sacrifice of a million white men, is it a wonder that Beecher should imagin that all this indicated great national prosperity?

That Beecher was a fine orator, an original thinker, no one can deny, but that fact makes the limitation of his thought occasioned by his environment all the more lamentably pitiful.

He has a monument, a statue, but he has left behind no word, no sentence that will be remembered and repeated as an impulse and an inspiration to those who gaze upon it in the years to come.

The Interior (Pres.) says:

They locked the Bible up in the tomb of dead languages, but the stone was rolled away. Then they relocked it in monastic libraries and searched out and burnt the copies which escaped. Then Volney, Voltaire, Hume, Hobbes, and Paine, and thousands more set to work to discredit it, and destroy its authority and influence among man—but that was only scattering the divine fire.

That the "divine fire" is considerably scattered—in fact, on the verge of going out, is apparent to every close observer of the decay of superstition in this day of criticism and reasonable doubt. "They locked the Bible up in the tomb of dead languages." Curious, isn't it? Nothing else that this alleged God made was locked up. All and everything else seems to hav had an easy time of it; but this one product of his has had the hardest kind of a road to travel. It is having it now, and there is no telling what its fate will be. As this is the only creation of this alleged God that man can alter or unmake, I suppose he must be pardoned for battering it, fighting over it, and setting up his own interpretation as the only true and perfect one.

Brussels, June 27.—A letter from Rome received here today says: "There has been received in Rome a memorial addressed to the cardinals endeavoring to enlist their aid in the scheme of colonizing European priests in the United States as heretofore fully described in these dispatches. It boldly asserts that the European governments must exert themselvs to retain their influence over their emigrants to the United States."

This is a scheme to hold intact the deceived and deluded victims of Romish superstition who emigrate to the United States. It is found that the church is losing members by amalgamation of emigrants with Liberal Americans and it is designed to preserve the national language of the emigrants so that the church may more easily retain its influence over them. It proposes to keep the children from the public schools and the men from secret societies. Such a scheme as this should be nipped in the bud; it is subversiv of human liberty, an enemy of free thought and progressiv intelligence. These poor victims should be protected from these jackals as much as from the thieves who rob them at Castle Garden.

They are down in the dark valley of error, and the church stands guard over them, preventing their coming up out of their mental darkness into the light of Freethought and perfect liberty.

They do not protest, because they are too ignorant to know of the rank injustice which is being done to them. To say that the government has no right to protect such mental imbecils from religious thieves is to set free all confidence operators and fakirs who prey upon the credulity of mankind. They both proceed upon the same line of action, deceive their gullible victims with fantastical lies and eventually rob them. Justice calls for the prompt suppression of this conspiracy against the principles of American liberty.

WM ALLEN SMITH.

Letters to Workingmen.

I hav referred to the fact that government in the minds of most of our writers is an ideal creation bearing little or no resemblance to the real government to which I am opposed. I want to impress the fact of this distinction upon your minds. It is all-important in dispelling the glamour the old superstition of an infallible state has thrown around government, preventing an honest investigation of its merits. Education and inheritance hav given us a wonderful idea of government. If there is an evil in society we rush to government imploring its protection or praying for relief. And our belief in government is in no way shaken if our prayers are unheeded and our petition spurned. As in our ideas of God, evil is in no way associated with government; if evil exists it must be the work not of the devil but of designing men. Designing man is prone to evil, but "the king can do no wrong." If it were not for this superstition the government of man by man would never be tolerated. When we come to consider the inhumanity of the law, the injustice of the court, the imbecility of its functionaries and the utter uselessness of nineteen-twentieths of the machinery of government; when we realize the vast sums of money we are paying to support the vast army of officials, salaries which often exceed our own wages doubled and quadrupled, we must admit our generosity toward our servants is remarkable. Not only are we generous in paying them, but we giv these servants of ours power to deprive us of our property, of our liberty, and even of life itself. I ask you to consider what your own knowledge and experience hav told you of the absurdity and injustice of the acts of officials, and I want you to think of these acts as the real government. Look up the record of these gentlemen and see if they be worthy of this confidence you hav reposed in them. Go over the ground carefully, credit them with all the good they accomplish and charge them with all the evil. Take no heed of the special pleading of politicians, but confine your evidence to facts only. Be not hasty in the account. Keep your mind on official acts as the government, and see that the good credited as well as the evil charged is derived from these acts, and when the trial balance reveals the truth of the government's standing, you will be ready to exclaim with Cassius:

> Upon what meat doth this our Cæsar feed,
> That he is grown so great?

And I shall answer, "Flapdoodle, that sailors feed fools withal"—the proverbial philosophy of politicians. What good does government do? Does it restrain criminals and prevent crimes? Take up the history of government and you will find the greatest criminals hav developed under the most rigorous laws. When the death penalty was administered for some hundred and forty different offenses there was actually more of those acts committed than later, when the government took little or no notice of them. Restrictiv measures hav ever provoked more crime than they prevented. Punishment never prevented crime, but manufactured and hardened criminals. Poverty and crime are children of one sire and that sire is government. Is it not so? Let us see. Poverty results from the unequal distribution of wealth. This inequality results from the advantage capital has over labor, owing to the former's self-propagation. Originally dependent upon the union of labor and material, it acquires the ability to increase without any aid extended from its original factors. And this acquisition, known as interest, is the result of government. And as we trace poverty back to its original source, we may, with the additional steps—degrading influence of injustice, and reaction from tyranny of authority—trace crime back to the same progenitor. What good does government do? Does it assure our property? If we mean that property which Proudhon denounced as robbery, I answer, yes, government assures robbery every time. But if we mean what Proudhon termed possession, the right of toil, the gift of nature, I shall answer no. This property began before governments and shall continue when governments are no more. It is this increase, this artificial process of generation, which depends not upon the parent factors, that government assures.

Allow me to dwell upon the fact that property—that is, the science of thine and mine—is in no way dependent upon government. Like the sense of justice, the chief factor in determining and securing our rights of property, it is inherent in the individual, and under liberty is respected and maintained. Government enters to abrogate that sense of justice and assume the rights of eminent domain; and property, the child of the state, merits the definition of Proudhon, "property is robbery." I want you to think it over carefully, friends. It will require time and patience, but in the end you will see your way clear. Read all you can; but do your own thinking and draw your own conclusions, and above all do not accept the bare assertions of men as evidence, no matter how "great" may be the men, or beautiful the saying.

What good does government do? Does it facilitate commerce? No! it impedes commerce by placing its agents upon the highways and byways, demanding from its merchants tributes in the form of taxes, licenses, and tariffs. From the princely merchant to the poor old woman who vends shoestrings upon the streets, this monster draws his revenue. With this difference, the merchant may find it a blessing, the poor old woman a curse, while trade itself is embargoed. Does it assist the citizens to coöperate to the best advantage? No, true coöperation must be on a voluntary basis. Government deprives the citizens of the right to coöperate, by assuming superior wisdom as to how it should be carried on. It dictates what is to be done, and takes the lion's share of profits. Does the convict coöperate with the state in the production of wealth? He does, but the jailor takes all the wealth. Even such is our governmental coöperation conducted by political schemers to advance their own interest while making it appear that they are working for the "dear public."

What good does government do? Does it conserve morality? does it promote right conduct? No; government is entitled to no thanks for right conduct. It is to civilization or humanization that we should bow. Again I ask you to inquire into the conduct of those who constitute government; look into the mode of their appointment and election and tell us what good could be expected. "Do we gather grapes from thorns or figs from thistles?" I tell you, friends, whatever good results from government is due to that power behind the throne which could act to a much better advantage through a voluntary coöperation of the people, entered into purely for self-interest and self-protection. But if good ever does result from government, may we not cultivate that good by reforming government in its interests? Here is where the reformer fails—in ascribing to government that which results in spite of government. Good evolves from association. It arises from identical interests of the various individuals, and government, not to provoke its hostility, may accede to its demands, and then with "cheek" incomparable claim all praise and honor attending the performance. Even as the church is claiming as its own all the good arising from civilization, even appropriating the honors of scientific research. A Catholic priest has been going around the country boldly claiming his church as the "mother of science," and all the truth he had to base the assumption upon was the fact that certain individuals belonging to the church interested themselvs in science, while the church as an organization has ever antagonized scientific research. These assumptions arise from the idea that all good abideth in the God idea; hence, to the church as agent is due all praise. And what is true of the God idea is equally true of the government idea.

Good is the result of those actions of the individual which tend to the happiness of the individual. It is a purely selfish motiv and it is impossible to organize an institution based upon this individual motiv, simply because the institution is an individual of another order, a consumer but not a producer. It is an abnormal growth, a fungus on the body of society.

But would you not organize your coöperativ association? Yes, to the extent and for the purpose of advancing the interests of the individual members composing it. But not as an individual having dictatorial powers. The individual must be free to think, to speak, and to do unrestrained, unless his actions interfere with the equal liberty of another. But "what's to be done?" Right or wrong, we must support government. We may refuse to designate our choice of servants, but servants we must hav. And they hav a nice little plan whereby their pay is assured. Our wages may be cut down, or lost entirely, but we must pay our servants all the same. Friends, "where there's a will there's a way," providing this will proceeds upon scientific principles. Force, physical force, engenders force, and the weakest go to the wall, and the right, if in the minority, and it mostly is, never comes uppermost and never is justice done. Such force is of no use unless it be the greater force. And then it is useless to accomplish what we most desire—liberty. But there is a force we may employ, slow but sure; it is attended with no reaction. The force of intellectual reason. Of cool, inflexible logic. A stubborn sense of justice. A rigid determination to take care of ourselvs, and mind our own business. And no organization is really needed to accomplish this. Whenever a considerable number hav determined among themselvs that they are

Men who know their rights,
And knowing dare maintain, and will submit to injustice and enforced regulation only because brute force is in the ascendency; when every action against their will is accompanied with their protest, and their will is set in rebellion against all wrong and injustice, a quiet movement will be inaugurated, an irresistible impulse given to a bloodless revolution. The machinery of government, whereby a few are enabled to grind the many, will be revealed in all its intricate cussedness, and public opinion, like oxygen, will encrust and enfeeble its running gear, and entangle its officials in their own red tape, while the citizen, grown strong in self-reliance, will laugh at the cobweb that was holding him in thrall.

Going to Church.

To church some folks
Go just to hear
The pastor's jolks,
That sound so quear.

Some only go
To walk the aisle,
And gaily sho
The latest staisle.

Some go from fright,
Some for the beaux;
Some to incight
A pleasant deaux.

Some for a hymn,
Some for a psalm,
Some for a whymn,
And some for pshalm.

Some go from pique;
Some go to cry;
And some to s'que
A home on hy.

Some go to guard
Themselvs from guile;
Some think it's huard
To walk a muile.

Some go to weigh
Their sins and cough;
Some go to preigh,
And some to scough.

Some go who ache,
As sinners should;
And some to mache
Their business gould.

Some go to laugh;
Some to malign;
And some to quagh
Communion wign.

Some listen through
The preacher's word;
Some in a puough
Sing like a bord.

Some go to grieve;
Some go to doubt;
Some go to lieve
Ere church is oubt.

Some go to view
The costly choir,
But very fiew
For fear of foir.

Mistaken for a Pickpocket.

[Mr. William Henry Burr, our Spiritualist friend and anti-Christian correspondent, was in the olden times a reporter for the Associated Press—and a good one. It was early in the fifties that Kossuth, the Hungarian patriot, visited the United States and made a triumphal tour of the country. The best reporter on the staff was wanted for service in the company of so noted a personage, and the assignment naturally fell to Mr. Burr. An amusing episode of the journey was written up by a staff correspondent of the Cincinnati Nonpareil and printed in the columns of that paper at the time of its occurrence. The daily Standard recently fished it up and printed it. The story runs:]

On Wednesday of last week, Kelsey, proprietor of the American House at Columbus, received a telegraphic dispatch from a police officer at Cleveland which read as follows:

Sir: On the Kossuth train of cars to-day is a New York pickpocket. Look out for him. He is a great scoundrel—dark hair, slim—whiskers, wears a green overcoat, gold spectacles—let police know.

Kelsey sent for a couple of the capital officers, showed them the dispatch, and bid them watch. They went to other hotels and warned the clerks.

About dusk the arrival of the train of cars bringing Kossuth and suite was announced by the firing of cannon. The train had hardly entered the depot when a young man sprang from one of the cars and elbowed his way vigorously through the crowd until he reached the street. Here he made inquiry for the principal hotel, and was directed by a man who seemed to hav followed him. Arrived in the city, his "friend" pointed out the Neil House. He boldly walked up to the office and inquired if he could hav a room. Mr. Gardner, the clerk, said, "Indeed, sir, we cannot accommodate you—our rooms are all taken."

"Is there another hotel near?" said the stranger.

"The American is just above," answered Mr. Winchester, assistant clerk.

The stranger in hot haste departed, thinking there was small chance for accommodations for him in that town, his "shadow" of course following him.

He entered the American and again wanted to know if he could be accommodated with a room. The clerk looked confounded and gave him no positiv answer.

"Well," said the stranger, "I shall order my baggage here anyhow, and do the best I can with myself."

Off he went for his baggage. Now he had two "shadows." In half an hour he returned, deposited the valise in the hall, and went to the office and was about to register his name, when a young man tapped him on the shoulder, saying, "Sir, we cannot accommodate you at all."

"Can't I hav a cot?" The clerk looked toward a gentleman at the desk, who shook his head, and then he answered:

"Everything is engaged—we cannot accommodate you at all. I say, you must find quarters at some other place."

Leaving his baggage, the stranger a third time went in quest of lodgings. The clerks at the American heard no more of him that night.

At 10 o'clock the following day an immense crowd had assembled in front of the Neil House to hear Governor Kossuth make his great speech. Kelsey ordered his carriage, and taking his family, drove as near the platform from which the speaking was to take place as was practicable. Looking out of the window of his carriage to get a view of the Hungarian governor, whom should he see upon the platform, close by Kossuth's side, pencil and note-book in hand, but the identical "pickpocket" who had been refused lodgings at his house. "That's a sharp one," said he to himself, "or else I've been sold."

At this moment a member of the legislativ committee, on his way to the platform, passed the carriage. Kelsey called him. Said he:

"Who the deuce is that fellow on the stand there, that fellow with spectacles?"

"W. H. Burr," answered the legislator, "a reporter of the New York Associated Press, who has traveled with Kossuth ever since he came to America and has reported all his speeches."

"The devil," cried Kelsey.

"Why?" said the legislator.

"I'll tell you another time," answered Kelsey, saying to himself, "here's a nice 'sell' for our officers."

As soon as he could find the original "shadow," he took him by the button to "bore" him privately, but the "shadow" took the hint, and exclaimed:

"No, you don't; we were all sold. I gave that fellow up when I saw him talking with the Hungarian intimately, and learned that he was to room with Kossuth's physician, having been invited by the doctor when it was known he had found difficulty in getting lodgings. The fellow we were after went on to Cincinnati, by George; the other chap answered the description, didn't he?"

That afternoon Kelsey gave a history of this "capital" adventure to two or three members of the press, and that evening oysters, quails, etc., were ordered at the American for a small party, in honor of the "great pickpocket." May his "shadow" never grow less, is the prayer of W. T. C.

Spirits (?).

I hav just had a call from the Pleasant Valley medium, Jeremiah Eighmie, a man of about eighty, strong and vigorous of his age, and full to the brim of enthusiasm on the subject of spirits, spirit-power, and future life. I hav heard he could call up spirits, and do, or hav done, independent slate-writing, but found he could do neither. But he was full of wonderful stories of all he had done and had seen and experienced. He told of marvelous cures he had effected, some right in Pleasant Valley. But on investigation, after he was gone, I found no one who was healed. He told of curing a cancer with a few moments of laying on of hands, and not a scar remaining. A paralyzed woman livs near by, and I proposed we should go there and then, and he should try the curing process on her. "You would not believe it was spirits if I did cure her." "No," said I, "but I should believe you possessed the wonderful gift, and the woman would be benefited, so the work would be a grand one." But he would not go. He said he (or the spirits) were not able to cure all cases. "Well," said I, "maybe you could cure this one." I said I had read for years and years just such cures as he told of effecting, and now I did not want talk but deeds. He promised to try things for next winter, but that will all be too late for me. He is about starting off for Cassidegua camp. If friends who read this will please seek him out and report of his cures and other notable works there and report to me, I will be duly grateful. Letters addressed to Snowville will always reach me.

The "Massacre" of Missionaries.

The folly, amounting to criminality, of sending missionaries to China is again shown by the late killing of one of the preachers and a customs officer at Wusick. The riot, of which so much has been said, and so little known, was due solely to religious fanaticism provoked by religious zeal. The true story is now told by a United States naval officer, Lieutenant-Commander Marthon, of the United States steamship Palos. In a letter to his wife, in San Francisco, writing from King Kiang on June 8th, he says that the Palos reached there on June 6th. Learning that a riot had taken place at Wusich the night before, he proceeded up the river to that place, where he received information from the Chinese customs clerk of the killing of two men by rioters. Marthon visited Sione, accompanied by guides from Chinese gunboats, and found the body of Missionary Argent lying where he fell in the gateway at the door of the church, which had been pillaged by rioters. The body of Custom House Officer Green was found lying in the street several squares distant. It had been covered with mats.

Captain Marthon asked for permission to take the bodies aboard the Palos, but was told that the inquest had not been held. He attended the inquest next morning, and describes the peculiar methods of Chinese officials in such matters, the inquest being devoted chiefly to the beating of drums, explosion of firecrackers, and other ceremonies.

The cause of the riot, he says, was the fact that Missionary Argent had picked up four little orphans in the country and was conveying them to Hankow in baskets borne on the shoulders of coolies. A street lounger asked one of the coolies what was in the basket. The bearer refusing to answer, the curious man raised the lid, disclosing the children. The crowd which had gathered raised a cry that the missionary was taking the children away to dig their eyes out, and forthwith attacked the church, killing Argent and plundering the place. Customs Officer Green was met by the mob and killed while on his way to assist the wives of the missionaries.

On the return of the Palos from Wusich to King Kiang word was received of an attempted riot in that city. Men were landed from the Palos, from the French frigate Inconstant and German ship Otus, to protect the settlements, but at the request of the Chinese general, who informed the respectiv consuls that he would protect the place, the sailors were withdrawn. No outbreak followed, but the American residents withdrew from the city at Lieutenant-Commander Marthon's suggestion. In closing his letter, he says the Chinese don't want religion, and that he has yet to meet the first Christian Chinese. The nativs appear to be aroused wherever the missionaries happen to be stationed, no matter whether for church, school, or hospital purposes.

This seems to be a case of where a little preaching of the good old adage of "mind your own business" would be worth more than the preaching of any gospel. The Chinese are religious fanatics as well as the Christians, and can fight for their religion "allee same clistan man." Supposing the Chinese here picked up four little orphans of Christian parents and conveyed them in laundry baskets to a Chinese place to be taught to detest Christianity and revere Confucianism. If the Christians who saw them were of the Greek church or the Roman church, they would probably do as the Chinese did—kill the kidnappers. The Christians acted so in Russia, believing of the Jews as the Chinese did of the Christians—that they intended to mutilate and sacrifice the children.

Commander Marthon's reflection upon the uselessness of sending missionaries to China has aroused the heads of the missionary societies here, who make a good living by forcing their superstition upon unworthy "heathen," and naturally they dispute his assertions, but as he has no ax to grind, while they hav several gross, the public will probably giv credence to the naval officer, as it agrees with previous testimony from other unprejudiced observers in the navy. There is no doubt that a number of Chinamen here and in their own country hav professed to be Christians, but such declarations are always made for a purpose. Like the Jews gathered in by the Christians' Jewish mission in this city, the Chinese are converted for what there is in it—food, money, to learn the language, and, in this city, at least, to enjoy the society of the teachers. The Chinaman is a peculiar animal, and not always an honest or decent one. He is full of guile and as superstitious as a Roman Catholic. He may pretend to forswear his own religion, but it is doubtful if he ever really believes what he professes. In his own country, when converted he is simply debased, though, perhaps, it is difficult to further debase the class from which the missionaries draw their recruits. He would be better off if left to his nativ superstition, for that which he acquires from the missionary is no nearer truth, and of about equal utility in this life.

The missionary business affords a rich living to a lot of clerics, through begging, which almost amounts to robbery, and it will probably be continued as long as there is a baby with a penny in his little fist which the societies can get. But the babies will one day find out the swindle, and then their babies will hav more candy and fewer heathen.

Some Axiomatic Truths.

Exemption from taxation is the same as an appropriation.

When one piece of property is exempt from taxation, other property must bear the burden. Everybody bears a part in church exemption, that is, it costs everybody something.

It is neither fair nor lawful to compel non-churchgoers to pay a portion of the church tax. It is against the spirit and letter of the Constitution.

Protestants should not be compelled to pay a large proportion of the Roman church taxes, as they are compelled under the present system.

Roman Catholics should not be compelled to pay a large proportion of the Protestant church taxes, as they are compelled under the present system.

Infidels should not be compelled to pay a large proportion of the Protestant and Roman Catholic church taxes, as they are compelled under the present system.

One may worship in a hundred thousand dollar house, his neighbor on one side in a thousand dollar house; yet he pays precisely the same amount of the tax on the hundred thousand dollar house as the man who worships there. Another neighbor does not worship at all; yet he pays the same portion of the tax on both houses as do they who use them. He is compelled by law to help support institutions from which he derives no benefit—institutions in which he does not believe—sectarian institutions, and therein is the letter and spirit of the Constitution violated, which declares that no man shall be taxed for the support of any sectarian institution.

The state, by exempting church property, is violating the Constitution, for as exemption is the same as an appropriation, that section which declares that no money shall be appropriated for the support of any sectarian institution is violated.

In all large cities, where taxation is high, the Catholics hav more property than the Protestant sects. Yet to save their one dollar the Protestants pay two for the Catholics.

The Methodists hav more property than the Unitarians. But the Unitarians act in this matter like the rest of the small Protestant sects.

The Episcopalians hav more costly churches than the Congregationalists; the Presbyterians more property than either of the Baptist sects; any of them more than the Seventh Day Adventists; but they are all in the same financial quagmire—to save a penny they spend two or three. Infidels hav but little common property, but on what they do own they not only pay their own taxes but per capita proportion on all the churches, asylums, parochial schools, nunneries, monkeries, etc., owned by the sects.

As things are at present, monstrous injustice is done in the matter of taxation.

The Hand of the Pope.

The Irish-Americans, if not the Irish, are at last awakening to the fact that the pope is running the politics of Ireland, and running it much to the disadvantage of the Irish in return for favors granted him by the British government.

At a meeting of Parnellites held in this city last week it was charged—and those who made the charges are in a position to know—that priests in Ireland are district politicians, visiting every house and instructing the men how to vote, and on election day acting as agents in the polling booths. Further, that political opponents are denounced from the altar and recalcitrant voters deprived of the sacraments, "upon the sole ground that they entertain political views opposed to those held by their spiritual guides, who invariably and dogmatically insist on their own views being adopted as the voter's rule of political action." The instance is cited of the bishop of the diocese in which Carlow is located running around and unduly influencing the electors at the last bye election. Still further, these Irish-Americans, who do not appear to be afraid of the pope, assert that in Ireland "there exists an appalling state of things, namely, that independent judgment in political matters in that country, the inalienable right of every voter, is scarcely permitted to exist, is practically a nullity, and that the Catholic clergy arrogate the right to decide for the voter on matters purely temporal, and which should be distinct and remote from the domain of clerical influence." And to mark their condemnation of this state of things, the meeting

"Resolved, That we, the Parnell leadership committee, protest emphatically against this most reprehensible, illegitimate, and improper use of clerical influence exercised as regards matters purely political and secular, upon the masses of our people at home, great numbers of them being illiterate and uneducated, and we especially protest against such illegitimate influence when exercised to a degree amounting to galling persecution and intimidation, practiced by the clergy under color of their sacred office and mission.

"And it is further resolved, That we invite the serious attention of our countrymen to the altered tone of the 'Nonconformist press,' which played such a conspicuous part in the attempted overthrow of the Irish leader, and to the recent utterances of British statesmen, plainly stating and implying that a people who are the mere political puppets and servants of any clerical or sacerdotal system are unfit and unworthy of being intrusted with the responsible privileges and the inestimable blessings of self-government.

"And it is further resolved, That we invite the attention of the American press, the mightiest champion and safeguard of civil liberty on this continent, whose great record has been and is one of constant and consistent hostility to clerical interference in matters political, to the present state of affairs in Ireland, with a view of invoking their support in the struggle for civil liberty there, which has resolved itself into a contest between the laity and the clergy for supremacy in the councils of the nation, and we expect the press of this country to be true to its long-established platform of principles, which hav proclaimed to the world that clerical interference in politics is utterly incompatible with free institutions, and we expect them to extend even-handed justice and fair play to the man who is now courageously fighting the battle of civil liberty against ecclesiastical domination. We denounce ecclesiastical influence as a menace to unfettered liberty of conscience in political affairs, to freedom of the ballot, as contrary to the spirit of this enlightened age, and we declare that it aims a fatal blow at the very life of the movement for national self-government."

These are good and "ringing resolutions," but they will not help Ireland much, and it is well within the lines of probability that some of the Catholics present at the gathering which adopted them will feel the sharp edge of clerical displeasure, and be compelled to do penance for having voted for them. The priests of Ireland hav too firm a hold upon the people of that country to be shaken off by a word, and the power of the Catholic church in this city was shown when Dr. McGlynn rebelled, and is yet daily on view in our city hall, where Corrigan's heelers are in supreme control.

So long as he can prevent it the pope will never allow Ireland to control herself. She is too good a makeweight in his negotiations with England for a papal representativ at St. James's and an English ambassador at the Vatican, in recognition that the pope is a temporal as well as spiritual sovereign. His "holiness" pretends to be a friend to the Irish people, and allows them to rebel just sufficient to make England nervous, only to trade upon their desire for home rule. Parnell, not being a Catholic, was a leader dangerous to the church, and his domestic troub'e has been made an excuse for politically opposing him. The pope wants him put out of the way, and the priests in Ireland worked to that end in the recent elections.

It is well that the American friends of Ireland are at last recognizing the hand of the pope in Ireland's affairs. It would be just as well, and more to the purpose, if they recognized the same hand working evil in the affairs of the United States.

That Nazarene.

The editor of the American Spectator says: "The church to-day must go back to the meek and lowly Nazarene, or occupy the religious position of pagan Rome at the time of the rise of Christianity." When the church does that it will be laughed out of sight, and its members branded as Communists. The "saviors" of this day, copying Christ, are sneered at and joked about by sensible folks, while the more impulsiv Christians talk of tar and feathers. The nineteenth century does not believe in "immaculate conceptions," nor in "divine" persons, nor in half-insane religious tramps. What savior would be allowed in the Stock Exchange to whip the brokers? Ninety-nine hundredths of the towns would put Jesus in jail as a vagrant. Meekness and lowliness are at a big discount nowadays, and a New York Anarchist is about the only man who preaches "resist not evil," and he is an Infidel!

The world is going ahead, not backward, and Mr. Flower should remember the fact. Meek and lowly Nazarenes, or any other variety of "saviors," are anachronisms.

Our Postmaster-General.

A Pennsylvania friend adds a sentence to a business letter as follows: "How amiably you are behaving toward Wanamaker. He is as great a rogue as Marsh or Bardsley." This has reference to the complications in the failure of the Keystone bank in Philadelphia, of which the daily papers hav been full lately. But the reason of our silence in the matter is that we do not wish to do our postmaster-general an injustice. As long as there is a doubt of his responsibility in that failure, giv him the benefit of it. But we can, without indorsing them, present the opinions of some of the journals which hav followed the matter closely. One of the clearest opinions is that of Puck, expressed in a cartoon entitled "Truth Stranger than Fiction," representing Wanamaker seated at a desk; a spindle on either side of him. One contains a list of his advertisments in the Philadelphia papers; the other, the good things which the papers securing his liberal advertising had to say of him. In front is a sheet of paper, upon which the postmaster is represented as having just written, "Brother Wanamaker will address the Bible-class next Sabbath on the higher morality." Behind him stands a spirit bearing the well-known features of Charles Dickens, in whose hands are manuscripts containing in legible lines the names Uriah Heap and Mr. Pecksniff. The spirits of these wonderful creations also appear in the background. An explanatory poem accompanies the cartoon:

A wail went up in the Spirit Land—
Such a wail as the spirits understand—
A wail to which a spirit givs birth
Who hasn't done all he should hav on earth;
A certain sort of a dismal wail
That suggests "I didn't mean to fail—
But oh! if it had or it hadn't been I'd hav done as well as I always mean!"
And the spirits, hearing it, said: "Great Scott!
What was it the good Charles Dickens forgot?"

"I didn't forget," wailed Dickens's ghost;
"Of the stuff I had I made the most.
I tried my best and I did my best;
And you know that I didn't leave much for the rest.
But the trouble with me
Is this, you see,
My life had too short a mortal lease
To giv me a chance at my master-piece.

"I don't believe"—the ghost went on—
"That in all the years that hav come and gone,
Any writer on earth below
Ever could think of beginning to know
The depths of human hypocrisy
Within a mile and a half of me.
You all of you know that this isn't conceit—
Whose hypocrits can my hypocrits beat?"

And the other ghosts cried in a hearty way,
(For they tell the truth up there every day),
"Nobody, Charles. No man ever knew
How to draw them as well as you.
The types you created will last as long
As the dress of Right is stolen by Wrong;
So long as Vice, and Meanness, and Sin
Use Religion's garb to masquerade in
So long will Chadband and 'umble Heep
Their truth to their hideous models keep;
So long will Stiggins and Pecksniff stand
Archtypes of the hypocrit band.
Your hypocrits, Charles, are beyond a doubt
The finest hypocrits ever turned out."

The spirit of Dickens heaved a sigh,
Wiped the ghost of a tear from his eye,
"Well, then," he said, "just can't you see What a chance supreme 't would hav been for me"—
And he dropped his voice to a tone of awe—
"If I'd had John Wanamaker to draw!"

"'T would hav been beyond you!" the spirits said;
"You ought to be thankful that you are dead!"

The facts implicating our postmaster-general are set forth in the World, commenting upon his latest denial of complicity in the roguery:

"Mr. John Wanamaker has made another and futil attempt to escape the toils. He has denied, but he has not proved his denials, and all Philadelphian attempts to make a plea of 'not guilty' equivalent to a demonstration of innocence will be abortiv.

"Bardsley's statements and Wanamaker's own denial contain new charges. Bardsley reasserts the accusation that Marsh told Wanamaker of the fraudulent character of the Lucas stock, and that he tried to sell this stock as a condition to permitting the bank to go on. He further avers that Wanamaker borrowed public moneys of him through the interposition of Marsh. Indeed, Bardsley's statement greatly deepens the suspicion that much if not all of the $900,000 embezzled from the city was fed out to Republican politicians.

"Wanamaker himself admits that in response to Marsh's assertion that the stock was fraudulent he tried to extort money from the bank by threatening to inform the comptroller of the currency of the alleged overissue if his silence was not bought. In the ordinary relations of ordinary people this sort of thing is called blackmail.

"The case against the postmaster-general grows worse and still the president is silent. The councils' committee was very tender with him. It did not cross-examin him. It left him to do his own talking in his own way, and he did not choose to explain the discrepancies between his first statement and the subsequent record testimony. He did not satisfactorily explain why the Lucas stock was issued to him and his employees. The value of his own statement consists in the admission that he had tried to extort money from Marsh by a threat.

"The councils' committee will evidently do its utmost to shield Wanamaker, but as the case stands he is convicted and his presence in the cabinet is scandalous."

Philadelphia is a Republican city; if the thieving had occurred in New York the Democratic politicians would hav been the beneficiaries. We are entirely impartial in politics. The New York Times considers Mr. Wanamaker's doings from a religious and moral standpoint. He says:

"Recent developments hav shown Mr. Wanamaker in a light that cannot but be very painful to any one who seriously believed that he was to bring to the government the great and unusual boon of a strictly Christian character. To those observers who feel the evidence to be conclusiv that Mr. Wanamaker's appointment was practically the reward for raising large sums of money, to be placed in the corrupt hands of Senator Quay for purposes some of which were sure to be corrupt, the substantial value of his Christian character seemed likely to be inconsiderable. But it will not be forgotten—certainly not by the teachers of religion who indulged in the criticism—that this view was treated as mere scoffing, as proof that those who held the view wished to discredit, not Wanamaker or Quay, but the Christian faith. We trust that this not unnatural incredulity will not be persisted in when Mr. Wanamaker is himself the author of the testimony that casts a doubt upon his veracity and personal honor. But whatever may be the attitude toward him of his fellow-professors of religion, they do but injure themselvs and their cause, and do not in the least help him, if they seek to belittle the gravity of the situation in which he has involved himself and his chief. 'Thou shalt not bear false witness,' is a commandment that is absolutely imperativ upon men who profess the religion of Christ. It is a law recognized indeed by human society quite apart from any divine sanction, and is severely enforced by so unreligious an association as the Board of Brokers. It is indispensable to the conduct of human affairs, and there is no community above barbarism in which it is not respected. As the facts now stand, Mr. Wanamaker has clearly borne false witness.

"Now, the importance of this from the point of view of party politics is plain enough to anyone. If Mr. Wanamaker or Mr. Harrison fails to perceive it, it will be made perfectly clear when an investigating committee of the next house of Representativs gets at work on the subject. That phase of the matter is not the one to which we desire now to direct attention. We should like to call to the minds of those particularly interested in religion the enormous injury done to public morals by such an exhibition of immorality in high places, and to impress upon them that nothing can be done to prevent or remedy this injury unless they themselvs unite in prompt and sharp condemnation of the guilty man. They may, if they choose, first call on Mr. Wanamaker to exculpate himself on the ground that he ought not to be condemned unheard, but that will be a futil proceeding.

"In the first place, Mr. Wanamaker is not unheard. On the contrary, he came before the public with a statement which has been shown to be incorrect, in which he not merely suppressed the truth, but denied it, not by inadvertence or the incompleteness of his testimony, but explicitly and for his own advantage. And the transactions as to which this misrepresentation was volunteered were in themselvs shady and disreputable, so that untruthfulness regarding them raises a strong presumption of guilt deeper and more disgraceful than that of untruthfulness through carelessness or cowardice. In the next place, there is already enough known to make necessary, not explanation, but expiation. We sincerely trust that the co-religionists of Mr. Wanamaker will take the matter up in earnest, and not leave to the secular critics—to those who, as Miss Dodge once said of the Unitarians, are wholly given over to morality—to defend the cause of religion from one who is to it a worse because he is an avowed champion."

Making due allowance for the political bias of these opinions we must confess that the opinion of our Pennsylvania friend has considerable plausibility. There are worse things that a man can do than superintending the transportation of obscene books about the country.

Editorial Notes.

HALIFAX, N. S., is burdened with too much tax-exempted property, and the citizens hav been discussing the plan of taxing everything. Halifax now exempts about three millions' worth of real estate belonging to corporations and religious societies.

INTRODUCING a clerical symposium on the question of absenteeism among the church folks the St. Paul, Minn., Sunday Globe says: "The Sunday theaters turn away hundreds from their doors. The Sunday ball games are well attended. The suburban resorts are all crowded Sunday. The great majority of the people go anywhere but to divine services. The old Puritan Sabbath is a thing of the past. Most people wear their very best clothes on Sunday and keep their hands and face clean. Cleanliness is as near to godliness as they ever get. The streets are nearly as crowded as on any other day. The drays and delivery wagons are for the most part not to be seen. People walk—walk without object or destination. Hundreds of them never go to church. They are too tired, or want the day for recreation."

MR. JAMES A. BRADLEY, the founder and mayor of the summer resort known as Asbury Park, is a fair specimen of the Sabbatarian hypocrit. He recently gave orders to his police to obtain evidence against all the merchants of the place who sold goods on Sunday. His detectivs had little trouble in obtaining evidence, as every place was wide open and business went on as usual. It was expected that a wholesale arrest would follow the next morning, but not a single arrest was made. The cause was this: On Saturday last a number of the druggists met and decided to keep their places open. At the same time it was decided to employ private detectivs and station them at Mr. Bradley's bathing houses and keep a minute account of every bathing suit and house rented by Mr. Bradley's employees. If Mr. Bradley caused their arrest for the Sunday violation, they would turn the tables on him and cause him to pay a fine for each and every suit and house rented. So Mr. Bradley sent out word that if the dealers would close their places of business on Sundays at ten o'clock in the morning they would not be molested. The druggists and cigar dealers thought this too thin a proposition. Allow Mayor Bradley to hire bathing suits in the morning, the only time when people would bathe on Sundays, and they close in the afternoon, the only time when people would drink and smoke? No such proposition would be entertained and they told Mr. Bradley so. They also informed him that he had not caused the Excelsior water stands, which were located on land leased of him, to be closed on Sundays. So Mr. Bradley retired from the fight, and the residents of Asbury Park can procure cigars, soda water, and medicin on Sundays. But what a hypocrit Mr. Bradley has shown himself to be!

Encouragement.

MONOBES, WIS., July 21, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Keep on showing up the absurdities of the old superstitions in your paper. I think you are doing very well. Truly yours, ED. WHIPP.

Cheering Words.

SPRINGFIELD, O., June 22, 1891.

MR EDITOR: The paper is just what I desire as a truth seeker, and the pictures are surely effectiv. I could not suggest any change whatever. I am entirely satisfied in every respect. Yours truly, CHAS. L. WHISTMAN.

An Honorable Veteran.

VOLO LAKE, ILL., June 21, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I hav taken THE TRUTH SEEKER ever since it was published in Illinois. I like the paper very much. I think the pictures add much to the paper. I am sorry I hav failed in not getting one or more new subscribers, as I hav done in the past. I find I cannot do as I would. I am past three score and ten years. I hope THE TRUTH SEEKER will liv to see superstition and priestcraft no more.

Faithfully yours, WM. C. HOWARD.

Pushing It Off the Table.

LA CONNER, WASH., July 2, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I am a Liberal and progressiv man from the ground up, and think that your paper does lots of good. I liv in a nest of psalm-singing, two-faced men and women. I had one row when they would come to my house. They got in the habit of pushing THE TRUTH SEEKER off the table. I told them I wanted that paper to stay on the table as long as I ran the house. My family was all raised under religious superstition, and cannot giv it up. I don't want any in mine. With best regards to the Truth Seeker Publishing Company, hoping that they may always liv, I remain,

Yours respectfully, JOHN BALL.

Out of Dense Darkness.

WOODSTOCK, June 23, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Find inclosed $5 25—$3 for my subscription, $2 for the "Pictorial Text-Book," twenty-five cents for the ANNUAL of 1891. I hav never seen a better paper than THE TRUTH SEEKER. Over twenty-five years ago I used to read the National Reformer in Northampton, England, and since I hav been here I hav read the Boston Investigator, Ironclad Age, Secular Thought, Freethought, etc., but THE TRUTH SEEKER is the best of all, I consider. I am a Materialist of the Thomas Winter kind, and I must say I fail to see anything in this Spiritualism, but at the same time like for everyone to hav their say. If I should suggest anything, it would be a debate on religion now and then; but you know best what the majority of your patrons want. I should like to get you a subscriber here, but the darkness is too dense and there are too many gospel shops to be supported. Wishing success to THE TRUTH SEEKER cause,

T. S. DENT.

A Flat Earth.

GLENDORA, CAL., June 15, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: If convenient, I wish you would giv through THE TRUTH SEEKER references to all scripture in the holy Bible which refers to this earth as being flat.

I wish some competent person would write a short tract which would expose the lie to the effect that the world is indebted to the holy Bible as a foundation for all laws which govern people and nations. The first who wrote any part of this book, I suppose, was Moses, who was born in Egypt long after that country, as well as many others, had reached a high degree of civilization as well as of learning.

Will Build a Hall.

HAMBURG, IA., July 16, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: John E. Remsburg, of Oak Mills, Kan., delivered a splendid lecture, entitled "False Claims of the Church," in the Opera House in this city, July 15th, to a good-sized audience, notwithstanding the numerous entertainments in the city and the tearing down of our bills announcing the lecture by orthodox bigots. Mr. Remsburg brought forth facts and historical information to prove all his assertions, interspersing his remarks by outbursts of eloquence of a high grade. Mr. Remsburg has given complete satisfaction here both as an orator and a gentleman. We hope to hav him again at some future time. Two years ago very few would listen to a Freethought or Spiritual lecture; now, when sufficiently advertised, crowds come to hear them. If the fight for freedom is kept up, it will not be long before this city will be the leading Freethought center in Iowa. A large Liberal hall will probably be built next year, if not sooner. Those wishing to help us in the cause of Universal Mental Liberty could not do better than send their old papers to August Wagner, who is an earnest worker for the cause. Yours for Universal Mental Liberty,

E. T. DALBEY.

Eulogy of America's Greatest and Best Man.

LONGSTREET, GA., July 16, 291.

MR. EDITOR: It is barely possible that I may be in New York some time during August. If so it will giv me pleasure to call around at your place of business and make your acquaintance, and that also of Colonel Ingersoll and Miss Helen Gardener. I want to take a few fearless and outspoken "Infidels" (so called) by the hand, and especially those who hav done and are doing so much to rid the world of superstition, false and cruel beliefs. In my opinion America has never produced a man who was or is the equal of Colonel Ingersoll in that which constitutes the grand, the great, the noble, the true, the good. He comes up to the requirements of, and constitutes, true manhood, uncontaminated by superstition or hypocrisy. My opinion is that he has done more than any other to excite Liberal thought, and to giv courage to the honest thinker, to question the old, and to discard the false and accept the true wherever found, when tried by the test of reason. He has well-nigh destroyed—as he undertook to do—that infamously damnable doctrin of eternal pain set forth in the New Testament and in the so-called Christian creeds. And if that alone constituted his whole life-work, it would be sufficient to entitle him to the unspeakable gratitude of all civilized, right-minded men.

In the evolution of thought in accord with the demonstrations of science, progress is being made toward the better.

It is getting so that on this side of the Atlantic and on the other scientists are not afraid to make their discoveries known and Freethinkers are not so much afraid to say what they honestly think. Colonel Ingersoll and his co-workers in his masterly line of thought hav brought about this happy state of things.

And to all who are engaged in the work for Universal Mental Liberty, I would say, keep the flag above the cross. And stand for the right because it is right and best, and for no other reason—i.e., without regard to any belief whatever. Let beliefs go; they are no good.

Yours for the right, T. N. MASON.

Defies the W. C. T. U. and the Priests.

MARION, CONN., July 20, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I send clippings from my local newspaper to show that the bigots are alive and that I propose to fight them in my town.

It seems that the Women's Christian Temperance Union thought they might scare some one with the "statute law of Connecticut," thus saving souls from hell, so they caused to be printed in the Southington Phœnix of July 10th the following:

PLANTSVILLE, July, 1891.

In consideration of continued and increasing disregard of the "law of God" in our town, it has been suggested that the "statute law of Connecticut" might arrest the attention, and lead to a higher standard of morality on the Sabbath day.

Sec. 57.—Every person who shall travel, or do any secular business, or labor except work of necessity or mercy, or keep open any shop, warehouse, or manufacturing or mechanical establishment, or expose any property for sale, or engage in any sport or recreation on Sunday, between sunrise and sunset, shall be fined not more than $4 nor less than $1.

In behalf of the Women's Christian Temperance Union.

In the next issue of the Phœnix I printed this:

NOTICE.

To the Parsons, Priests, Christians, and Women's Christian Temperance Union of Southington: In behalf of all timid unbelievers in this town I assert that for the Sabbath notions we hav no special respect. Therefore, admiring Christ more than theology, we claim Jesus does not consider us sinful if we "travel," "labor," "keep open shops," "expose property for sale," or "engage in any sport," "between sunrise and sunset," relativ to all days we please, provided we "do unto others as we would be done by."

Next Sunday I shall cut wood, write an article, "Jehovian Christianity," for THE TRUTH SEEKER, play the piccolo "to my heart's content," and perhaps "take a little wine for my stomach's sake," in acquiescence to 1 Tim. v, 23. If after this I deserve punishment, please inflict it according to the "law of God" set forth in Ex. xxxi, 15; and Num. xv, 31-36. Peruse last week's Phœnix to ascertain what prompts this advertisment. EDWIN N. BEECHER, Infidel.

I am told that a terrible sensation has been created among God's elect. The editor of the paper is an orthodox Christian, and I fear he will lose the friendship of his fellow-believers; but the dollar he charged me may be sufficient to buy more friendship (Christian). EDWIN N. BEECHER.

A Sin to Talk With Him.

HILL CITY, S. D., July 13, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I am more than pleased with THE TRUTH SEEKER and the pictures. Heston is a stunner.

This last spring Hill City has experienced one of those Methodist revivals that rain down on nearly every community in the United States once a year when the elements are all favorable. This time it was conducted by a clerical gentleman by the name of Rev. Mr. Ulmer. He is a young man, whom I should judge to be about thirty-eight or forty years old. His caliber isn't, or 22, but he has a sort of I-know-it-all style about him, and as times were a little dull and there was no other place to go, I, together with several Liberals and skeptics, attended his meetings, whereupon he seemed to be called upon by his holiness to pounce upon me, and in sermons and in his pastoral calls he undertook to show me the road, though narrow and crooked, to that place of eternal happiness, and after I asked him a few questions, and showed him up in the right light, he commenced to desist and rose and turned to go. I asked him to remain and giv me some light on the subject of salvation, but his answer was that he did not think he could commit a worse sin than to prolong his conversation with me. So he left me to fry in that place prepared for all who dare to think or ask a question, whereupon I asked him to remain and I would tell him a dream that I had, and as he consented I started out thus: "Now," I said, "Brother Ulmer, I had a dream the other night. I thought I had died and gone to heaven, and was admitted to the presence of God, and there seated by the side of him was Christ in a big armchair, and immediately after my arrival there, Brother Ulmer came in also, whereupon God said, 'Get up, Christ, and giv Mr. Ulmer your seat.'" This knocked him clear out of the ring, and you could hav easily played checkers on his coat-tail as he made his departure.

Now, Mr. Editor, leaving preachers entirely alone for a few moments, if I am not worrying you too much, I wish to speak of this country, the one hundred miles square known as the Black Hills. While I don't believe it advisable for very many poor men to come here, yet it has been truly said by one of our great financiers and railroad kings that the one hundred miles square in the Black Hills was the richest one hundred miles square on the face of the globe to day. This has reference to men with capital. Surely there are great opportunities here for capital and enterprise. I will willingly answer any questions of inquiry pertaining to this country. There are a plenty of good mines here that only need capital to make them the bonanzas of the United States. We hav gold, silver, and tin here in endless quantities. I remain,

Yours without Christ, R E. NYE.

Don't Mind Christian "Feelings."

OTTUMWA, IA., July 17, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: My admiration of THE TRUTH SEEKER increases after the perusal of each issue. Your last two numbers were especially good. You will lose nothing in circulation or influence by your kindly feeling toward Colonel Ingersoll. His vindication of Thomas Paine alone entitles him to the undying gratitude of all humanity. I am pleased to know that the pansy and emblem affairs are about settled, or at least hav been dropped from the columns of Freethought publications. They could not possibly hav had any bearing on the great question of mental liberty.

The field secretaryship might be advantageously dropped. When the Ottumwa Freethinkers want a lecturer they engage a good lecturer, pay his price, hall rent, etc., and that ends it. Why cannot other localities do the same? During the field secretaryship controversy one or two parties objected to paying the field secretary a salary of $2,000. Do they want to reduce such men as Watts and Putnam to the level of the $500 a year country parson?

I am not sure about my being a Liberal. I detest the institution known as Christianity, and am doing all I can against it. I hav often said that I would not let my children attend a Sunday-school. I object seriously to being sworn. The ridiculous idea that Jehovah would assist one in telling the truth, when he has prevaricated on several occasions most outrageously! I believe that Freethinkers should let the world at large know that they entertain nothing but contempt and scorn for the Bible and Christianity. Christians know nothing about "feelings" in the presence of a Freethinker. They say the vilest things about humanitarians like Voltaire and Paine and think nothing of it; but should a Freethinker refer sarcastically to their Joss or to Joss's earthly deputy, they raise their hands in horror.

Yours for common sense, JOHN W. DAYTON.

Was a Good Catholic.

ALBUQUERQUE, N. M., July 4, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I wish to say that it was your paper that turned me from a good Catholic to a Freethinker. It came about in this way. An agent for Wells, Fargo & Co., used to take your paper. His office was at Manuelito and his name is Mr. Guire; he is now of Winslow. I was running a train on the Atlantic & Pacific railroad and in the course of human events I got to see the paper every now and then. At first I was shocked. Then I took to reading the Bible. There I saw such indecent language and such inconsistencies that I had to giv up my faith. The next thing, I subscribed for your paper. Now I get more enjoyment out of life than I ever got before.

I wish to thank the Brotherhood of Moralists for a letter received some time ago in which they ask me to join their order; also the editor of Secular Thought for the favor of his paper, but I am unable to take it as yet, though I may in the near future. I hav not had time to read the by-laws of the Brotherhood yet. I will at the first opportunity, and if I can consistently, will join. My friends, who hav my welfare at heart in a Christian sense, tell me how when I am in hell they will look down from heaven on my suffering and tell me that they had told me so. But that makes no difference. I would rather be in hell with an honest man than in heaven with such men as Talmage, Holy John, or Sam Jones. I saw a very good cartoon in Puck about Holy John, where Dickens's shadow is looking over Johnny and says: "I hav died too soon. I should hav lived to put this holy man in a book." What a fine subject he would make for one of this great writer's books. Try and get Heston to write a story entitled "The Sunday-School Teacher," for the benefit of Holy John. My picture-book has been on the go for nearly a year, but I hav been unable to get you a subscriber. Yours for Universal Mental Liberty,

J. T. MURRAY.

Where $53,000,000 is Exempted.

OCEAN CITY, MD., July 20, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Your worthy paper with every edition brings forth some new vigor in the leaning toward Liberalism. I hav been holding the views I am holding for several years past—in fact, before I ever read any of your papers. But your editorials, combined with the writings of such persons as Colonel Ingersoll, Mr. J. Peck, and many others, and also the pictures so well prepared by that wonderful artist, Mr. Heston, hav made my belief more firm than it would hav been otherwise. I am not narrow-minded enough to read only articles concerning Freethought, or leaning toward Atheism, but I read as well sermons delivered by that great Stump Speaker on Biblical History, Mr. Talmage, Dr. Dixon, Dr. Ball, and many others. Last week I read the outlines of a sermon delivered by the Rev. Dr. Ball, and to my great surprise and also joy found that he is as yet the most liberal-minded preacher I hav ever heard of.

Well, nothing would please me better than to hav a Liberal Club organized to show the holy citizens of Baltimore that Liberalism is a growing factor, and not a diminishing lot of scarecrows. Let us hav a helping hand through you and your readers in Maryland. Perhaps you could hav more influence in sending an appeal to them through your paper. With a few good lecturers, as there can be found a great number among the ranks of the Liberals, we could make it one of the strongest organizations of its kind in the United States, for you can see more plainly in this city than in any other the defects in the orthodox churches. A bombshell thrown into the united mass of orthodox religions would cause a great deal of enthusiasm. Up to this time people, at least a number of men with open eyes and ears, can plainly see the injustice done toward the poor laboring man, as well as the farmer and many others, in exempting all church property from taxation, and especially plain may this be shown in our city, where churches own about $53,000,000 worth of property. The Taxpayers' Association of Baltimore has tried to show these unjust taxations plainly, but there seems to be some timidity to hit the question in the proper place.

A few words concerning the World's Fair next year. How would you decide on a question if it were well for the Liberals of this country to erect a building in which not only to exhibit the portraits of martyrs of Freethought and science, but also to hold meetings and lectures? I know that our men would draw the crowds, and allow the preachers and priests the empty benches as a good audience. Let us show some patriotism. Yours truly, SIDNEY J ROSENTHAL.

For Universalists a Hot Place, For Spiritualists a Hotter.

GIBSON, VA., July 14, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been a subscriber and reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER for about four years, and the more I read it the better I like it. It is the only paper I take that I fully read through, and many pieces that I find I read two or three times until I get them fully digested. I estimate THE TRUTH SEEKER to be the best paper on Freethought and reform in the world, being ably edited, and also contributed to by a corps of the best talented writers in America. It seems to me that it is everything that a lover of free thought and free speech could desire it to be. The pictures and cartoons by Heston are a great addition to the paper, from the fact that they attract notice to the paper by those who otherwise would never look at it, especially the children. I hav not been able to get any new subscribers, although I find many around me that love to read the paper. There are very few outspoken Liberals in this section of Georgia or in any other section of Georgia that I know of. In my opinion, there is not a state in the United States of America that is any more overrun with superstition than Georgia. But I can now plainly see that Liberalism is on the increase and church superstition on the decrease, but slowly. It is slow decrease, but, I think, sure and permanent, provided all Liberal-minded people will unite and come together on one common cause, and that is for the Nine Demands of Liberalism, and keep up and well support the Liberal papers in our land, especially THE TRUTH SEEKER, which is the great mouthpiece of the American Secular Union, and the strong advocate of the freedom of speech and press and equal rights.

I hope all arguments and controversies between Spiritualists and others who are not Spiritualists may cease, as the Spiritualists are Liberals and hav a common cause with those Liberals who are not strictly Spiritualists. Why should good Liberals argue about Spiritual communications to individuals in the flesh? It is an argument that never will be or can be decided on, to the convincing and satisfaction of all. As to the arguments against the Spiritualist, I am willing to leave that for the churches to do. The pulpit orators preach against it and say it is humbuggery and trickery and a straight-out falsehood, and a dangerous thing to believe. I once heard a minister in the pulpit say it was more dangerous to be a Spiritualist than to be a Universalist. So if there was any value in his assertions it would be very bad to be a Spiritualist. As the Universalist was after death going to a very hot place, the Spiritualist would go to a still hotter. Yours ever in the cause of freedom,

Some Problems in Nature.

FLAT CREEK, LA., July 15, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: In December, 1865, I was in Nemaha county, Kansas. I had set out some traps, and was going to them one still frosty morning, walking on ice. The creek had just frozen over with ice thick enough to walk on. No snow had fallen upon the ice, so it was smooth and clear. I discovered some ice growths in the form of plants, which had, like Jonah's gourd, grown up in a night, without seed germs. They were in form like the mullein plant, with leaves resembling polypodium. They had radical, cordate, serate, and pennatified leaves from one to three inches long and from one to two inches wide. These ice plants were of more beautiful design than any vegetable structures that I had ever seen. When I discovered these beautiful structures, composed only of ice, which had grown up during the cold still night, I was profoundly moved. There were the unmistakable finger-prints of deity, the architect of nature, which fashions the multiform beautiful vegetable structures, including the flowers. I stood and thought. The question immediately arose in my mind, what is it that can be here present and can do this beautiful work in the cold dark night, and is invisible and imperceptible to my senses? Here I conceived the idea that electricity is the intelligent architect of nature, the deity, the force, and intelligence behind phenomena, which men hav been ignorantly worshiping and addressing prayers to from away back in prehistoric times. I hav been studying nature upon this hypothesis ever since, and all the evidences which I can draw from nature direct, and from natural science, tend to confirm me in this conception.

The beautiful and varied artistic designs of snow-flakes, as seen under the microscope, and the regular geometrical forms, called crystals, which material substances assume when passing from a liquid to a solid state, impress upon my mind the conviction that there is in nature an intelligent designer, organizer, and builder.

We usually sow field-peas around Indian corn, and let the vines climb the corn-stalks for supports. I once planted a field of peas by themselvs; there was a forest of trees outside of the fence on both the east and west sides of the field, which cast their shades in the field of mornings and evenings. When the pea-vines began to run, on the east side of the field for twenty or thirty yards from the fence every vine ran eastward, and on the west side of the field every vine ran westward. Being climbing plants they ran toward the objects which cast a shade upon them, hunting something to climb, manifesting intelligence in pea vines. A self-supporting plant will lean itself from a shade to catch the sunlight. A climbing plant will run toward an object which casts a shade upon it, hunting something to climb. The sun-flower is facing to the east at sunrise, and bending its neck, it follows the sun during the day, facing to the west at sunset, then it turns back so as to be facing to the east again at sunrise. Pindar vines and some other plants close or fold up themselvs at sunset, and open out at sunrise. Some other plants will fold up their leaves when touched with a human finger. Everything in nature which is capable of manifesting intelligence possesses it, hence I infer that intelligence like electricity pervades all nature, but all things are not capable of manifesting its presence.

The brain of man and beast is a fountain of electricity, which flows from the brain along the nerves to all parts of the body. The brain is also the fountain of intelligence, the organ of thought.

Now, I believe that electricity is the unseen force and intelligence which is behind nature's phenomena and that I can produce stronger evidence in favor of that theory than any other man can bring to bear against it.

The Georgia Wonder's Feats.

LAKE CITY, IA., July 16, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I hav not seen anything in THE TRUTH SEEKER in regard to Emma Abbott, the Georgia magnet, or the wonder of Georgia, and in fact we might say the wonder of the world. I hav thought a few lines in regard to her might be interesting to your readers. Every word I write you in regard to her will be true, and no humbug about it. She was in the capital of our state a week, where a portion of my family witnessed her performance. She lifts eight or ten men on a large chair. Will take a billiard cue and lay on her hands at an angle of forty-five degrees, hands only partly closed, and no four men can push the end to the floor, or take it from her hands. Then place the cue in another person's hands, and she placing her hands on the underside of their hands, and the same phenomena will occur while hers are pressed against those that hold the cue. Standing on one foot four men cannot push her out of balance. They offered $1,000 for any man that could lift her from the floor, but he could not be found, and her weight is about 100 pounds, less or more. They placed her on a pair of scales, weight 108 pounds; a man pushed down on her shoulders; looking again, her weight was just 44 pounds. Put your hands on a wall, and she placing her hands on yours rather loosely, and three or four stout men cannot make her tighten up on your hands, or force her an inch to the wall. A glass tumbler placed on her wrist, and you hear her pulse ticking all over the room, but no pulse any other place. Her pulse is 145 per minute, temperature 95 degrees. Now, Eugene, here is a problem we want solved. While people know so much in regard to the world to come, we should like to know something more about this. But there is one thing we all know now, had this pretty little lady-like woman lived a few ages sooner, how glad God's Boston saints would hav been to get their hands on her. They would hav burnt or hanged her in short notice—all for Christ's sake. She is a perfect electric battery; but how is it operated? She does not know anything about it herself. One thing we think we know—she has power to reverse or suspend attraction, or kill gravitation, for she evidently lifts only the clothes and boots or shoes that are on the people at the time of lifting, as she has no power over dead matter, and cannot lift over 100 pounds of stone or iron. For her great power, her hands hav to touch other bare hands or arms—in short, come in contact with other bare and living flesh. Now, we must find out the great wonder in regard to this little woman while she is living and well, and not hav any guesswork about it. What becomes of the 64 pounds of weight when first weighed? We think we know, but are like the children that went to borrow soap; when the lady asked the little girl what they wanted, she said, "Ikey knows, but he would not tell, so I will not tell," but I think three pair of scales would tell. Put the lady on one pair, the man that pushes down on another, and a man lifting up on the third, and we ought to be able to tell who gets the lost weight; it is transferred to some one or some place. I hav written this letter while in feeble health, believing it a duty we owe to the world to find out what this wonderful woman is, and why she can do all these wonderful things, and above all where does her power stop. Can she kill weight on ten men, or ten thousand, and why? Here is a grand problem for science to solve, and should it turn out electricity, or eternal cause and effect, was the all in all that was running this old universe of ours, what an awful fix the preachers would be in, as bad as it would be to kill their devil. With best regards for yourself and all THE TRUTH SEEKER family, I am respectfully,

J. L. TOMPKINS.

Though Dead John Manning Liveth.

July 16, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: The Banner of Light, as you know, is a weekly paper published in Boston, and has been devoted to the exposition and defense of Spiritualism for many years. Connected with its large publishing house there is, I understand, a "séance" room, which is open to the public once a week, except during the months of June, July, and August. At these séances messages purporting to come from departed spirits, who had lived in different parts of the country, are received, and published in the Banner. In the issue of that paper for the 20th of June last was one from a man calling himself John Manning and hailing from a town in Alabama named Bessemer. It is as follows:

[To the Chairman:] I reckon you don't invite strangers from the South? [Yes, every one is welcome.] No matter where from? [That makes no difference.] Well, that's kind in you.

I come up North here to find the open way, not to the pole, but from the spirit-world to the earth-world. I don't know much about this; it's new to me. We don't hav any of these meetings in our parts, and so if I don't do very well I hope I'll be excused, for I need experience.

I was an officer doing my duty when I was sent out of the body. I went out by the hand of a darkey, and I don't feel altogether right about it—that is, when I come back into this atmosphere. When I am away in the spirit-world, it seems all right enough, though I didn't care to be hustled out.

I come around these parts once in a while, and I hear you Northern people talk about the "nigs"; but I tell you you don't know only half of it. By way of a change, some of you ought to come down our way and learn the other half; then, perhaps, you would be better able to draw a conclusion. Now, I know some of your good spirit people here, that are full of philanthropy and sentiment, will tell me I am prejudiced; but then, I don't think I am, and so I reckon I hav got to work the matter out, think it over, and learn all about these things from the spirit side.

I don't come here, stranger, to growl about things. I just came to see if there was such a thing as getting a message through these lines to old Alabama; and I thought if I succeeded in doing so, whether it was good, bad, or indifferent, no matter, I should find out it could be done; then I would try to get some of our people who would make a stir by coming, to come this way and make themselvs known. This is my principal object in speaking; then I would like to let my friends know I hav regard for them, and that I don't forget the past.

I hail from Bessemer, Alabama, and I am John Manning.

You will notice, Mr. Editor, that in this communication there are four distinct statements of fact: First, the name, John Manning; secondly, the former place of his residence, Bessemer, in the state of Alabama; thirdly, that he was an officer of the law; fourthly, that he met his death at the hands of a "darkey."

These statements, so circumstantial in their character, seemed to furnish a good opportunity for a test, and I resolved to investigate the case. Not knowing a human being in Bessemer, I wrote to the postmaster of that town, with a view either to verify or falsify the message purporting to come from John Manning. Never hinting, even remotely, what my motiv was in making the inquiries, I asked whether there was now, or ever had been, in that town or neighborhood, a man named John Manning? Whether he was alive or dead? If dead, what disease he died of? If he died by accident what were the circumstances of his death?

The postmaster turned out to be a courteous man, and to my letter sent a prompt reply, saying that there was a man named John Manning who had been a citizen of Bessemer; that he was a policeman; that in attempting to execute a warrant of arrest issued by the mayor on Sandy Jones, a negro, he was shot to death by that person, and that event occurred in the month of March or April, 1888.

It is noticeable in his message that Manning still has a grudge against the "nigs," as he calls them. This is not strange when I quote from Postmaster Mullen's letter in which he says that the negro who killed Manning "fired through a crevice near the door after saying he would come out. He asked Manning to strike a match, so that he could see—for the occurrence happened at midnight—and just as Manning did so the fatal shot was fired in the light of the burning match."

Now, Mr. Editor, I don't know how you will feel on reading this narrativ of facts, but whether all the rest of us when we pass through the gates of death will suffer a complete extinction of our being, it seems clear that John Manning, at least, who suffered death at Bessemer in 1888, is still alive and knows what he is about.

When we remember that this case occurred in the very department of inquiry where our scientists are devoting their lives and labors to the ascertainment of facts, without the least regard to the bearing they may hav on men's prejudices, may we not ask them—if they believe that death terminates the existence of a person—to explain the remarkable coincidence between John Manning's statements in the séance room at Boston, and the confirmation of their truth down in Alabama? Will we, who profess to be Freethinkers upon all subjects, allow our minds to be so prejudiced that we are willing to deny absolute facts, and call them lies, when they stubbornly stand still and refuse to get out of the way of our theories? Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for his Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

How We Spent the Fourth.

"Now, let us try and spend the Fourth of July, 1891, in a rational way," said some of the ladies of the W. E. I. society. After some discussion they concluded that a picnic, with music and speeches, would be as good as anything that could be got up in the short time we had to make our arrangements. Mr. J. Warburton kindly tendered us the use of Cresbrook Grove, on the new Boston road and within convenient distance of the horse-cars.

The night before the Fourth there was the usual din that small boys and large men are wont to make with firecrackers, guns, and tin horns. All night long they kept it up, with now and then an occasional lull. Consequently none of us slept very much, but, nevertheless, we were astir in good season next morning. The weather was threatening, if you remember, all the morning, with some drops of rain, but in the middle of the forenoon the sun shone out and the clouds rolled by. Mrs. Hyde came up with her carriage packed full of the good things we had decided to take along, but there was yet room to stow away our boxes and hammocks, which were loaded in as best we could. Arriving at the beautiful walnut grove the team was quickly denuded of its freight, and a table was erected with some boxes and plank that Pat Foley was kind enough to let us use. Mrs. Borden brought cloth with which to cover the table, and when it was set out with silver baskets of frosted cakes, dishes of candy, peanuts, and other goodies, it really appeared fine. Near by was suspended a massiv bunch of bananas. Under the table was an oil-stove and a copper boiler in which water was heated for coffee. Near by were two gallons of ice-cream and a cask of lemonade. Master M. Reed donated a big piece of ice for that, and really it was very delicious. Joseph, the colored man of our family, was busy for an hour putting up hammocks and swings under the trees. Meanwhile Mrs. Hyde's horse became entangled in his harness and we all hastened to extricate him. However, Joseph did the work and the rest of us looked on. At length the friends came, one by one and in groups, until the grove began to look lively with the flags swinging in the breeze and the children swinging and singing patriotic songs. For we would hav none other on that day, save the music of the birds overhead, who, tucked amid the thick walnut branches, evidently enjoyed the scene below as much as anyone.

The refreshment table was well patronized, and Bethia, Mrs. Hyde, and Jennie Burrell had all they wanted to do in waiting upon the eager and hungry customers. Little Nettie Belle toddled up to the stand with a penny. "I want a cent's worth of candy," said she. "Help yourself to a cent's worth," replied the waiter. The cunning little creature proceeded at once so to do, and filled both chubby fists with sweets, and then walked away with the satisfied air of one who has received her money's worth. Dr. Heath wandered out to the edge of the grove, and gathered daisies, wild roses, swamp pinks, ferns, and some of that curious plant of the leek species called Orpine, or, in common parlance, "dead man's hand." Alice Winslow, too, gathered a lovely bouquet of the pinkest wild roses, which afterward she gave to me. We did not begin our literary exercises so soon as expected on account of waiting for the late arrivals and the instrumental music, which latter failed us after all. But we had the robins, bob-o'-links, and the cat-birds, to say nothing of the laughter of the children.

Mrs. Hibbert came finally, her face beaming with a benevolent smile, as if she could mother the whole flock of us. Then our literary feast was commenced. For a rostrum we had a wide flat stone—not exactly flat, however, but it answered our purpose very well, indeed. The picnickers all gathered around in a crescent, except those who swung lazily in the hammocks close by. The opening address, bearing upon the nature and history of the day, occupied twenty-five minutes. It was by a lady, whose name will not be mentioned, but you can guess who it was. The speech elicited applause. Then followed the reading of an original poem by its author, Mrs. Hyde. It was fine, and had all the approbation it merited, which was not a little by any means. Mrs. Channell then read, in a firm, clear voice, the Declaration of Independence. The birds even stopped to listen. Rounds of applause followed the rendering of this immortal document. Then Bethia read "Independence Day." This was also applauded to the echo. Voluntary speeches were then called for, which were responded to by Dr. Dutton, of Boston, Robert Adams, Dr. Heath, and Mr. Champlin, the urbane attache of the Daily Evening News, who was sent up to report us. The old grove never echoed with so much patriotism before, and, mayhap, never will again.

The refreshment stand then occupied the attention, for after so much mental food the inner man must be hungry, and finally what little was left was sold by auction, Bethia being the auctioneer, and a very good one she was. The remainder of the ice-cream we gave the children, who had no pennies to buy with. Counting up our gains, we found we had twenty odd dollars, which paid for all our purchases, and left a balance of nearly four dollars for the treasury of the Women's Educational and Industrial Society, which, considering that the society had not undertaken the celebration to make money, was doing well. There were forty-eight grown people present, and twenty-three children.

There were no casualties to mar the pleasure of the occasion, except that Nettie Belle was struck in the eye by a green apple that fell from a tree in the farmer's yard adjoining, and Freddy Hyde fell out of a hammock, bruising his face, and bringing some tears.

In the light of the declining sun we gathered up the fragments of the feast, and wended our way homeward. Bethia's hammock was lost from the carriage on the homeward journey, which she and all regretted very much. It was one that little Susie had used, and was thus doubly precious.

We felt very well satisfied with this old-fashioned celebration of Independence Day, and we fancy we would hav had the approval of the old-fashioned folks had they been there to see and hear.

Perhaps some of them were there. Who knows? But if so, they did not make themselvs known or heard, and, as far as we know, we had the day all to ourselvs. S. H. W.

Chats with Correspondents.

ANNIE D.—Yes, you can write a short science story if you can do so, but it must not be too long. You are quite right in thinking there is enough to write about without resorting to fiction.

AURORA M. SOUTHWICK.—No, it cannot harm a bright girl like yourself, but you would learn more in a Liberal Sunday-school. The teacher is wrong in teaching that which she knows is untrue. She ought to stop it and teach instead the real and practical.

HENRY C.—"Puzzles, enigmas, and things." Certainly, we might hav them in the Corner if we had space. Some time, when the Children's Corner has expanded into a big room with four corners, we may hav all that is desirable, useful, and beautiful. Until that good time you must possess your mind in patience and hope for better days.

JOHN A. BROWN.—The tale about which you inquire is the oriental legend of Basudeva, who was the husband of Christna's mother, carrying away the little Christna to Nanda's house to save it from the hands of a tyrant, Kansa of Mathura, who had sworn to take its life. Undoubtedly this is the original of the story of Christ being taken to Egypt, on account of Herod having ordered the murder of the newly-born males in Palestine.

Chinese Schooling.

A Chinese boy begins school at about seven years of age, those of the higher ranks being taught at home by private tutors, while the poorer boys attend a school in common. As the Chinese language has no alphabet or grammar the method of study is peculiar. Each object is represented, not by a certain combination of letters, but by a character, which is different according to the thing it designates. Now, as everything known to the mind—every noun, verb, adverb, and adjectiv—is thus designated by an independent character, one may form a faint idea of the vast amount of labor required to master even a small part of the written language. Imagin attempting to study the Century or the International Dictionary, not by mastering the spelling of each word, but by learning for each of the thousands of words an entirely different character.

At the age of fifteen the boy is sent to one of the professors of the Royal Academy for examination. There he is given one word on which to write a composition, and for this purpose is locked up for a day and a night in an apartment alone. At the end of that time, if the composition be creditable, the boy takes his "first degree," and receives a gold button, which he wears in his hat.

He then studies for three years more, and at the end of that time undergoes a second examination, in which, if successful, he receives a second gold button. At the end of another three months' study he is summoned to Pekin to appear before the Imperial Academy. Here he undergoes a three days' examination, and, if successful, he is eligible for the highest offices in the empire. From among these graduates are chosen the foreign ministers, governors, and the highest officials of the government. Of course no boys except those of high rank are admitted to these examinations.—Philadelphia Times.

Correspondence.

COLLINS, NEB., July 9, 1891.

DEAR MISS WIXON: As this is my second letter to the Corner, I hardly know what to write, but, as I am here all alone, I thought I would try and write a few lines. This is my youngest sister's birthday. She is nine years old. Pa and ma and my two sisters went to my aunt's this afternoon, and my brother is after the cattle, so that leaves me here all alone. I had a nice time the Fourth of July. All of the neighbors gathered in to Mr. Aker's, and had a real nice time—had ice-cream and lemonade, oranges and candy. We hav not been to Sunday-school for a long time—do not know whether we will go any more or not. Almost all around here are Christians—that is, they think they are.

School will begin 1st of September. I will be glad, but we hav to walk a mile and a half to reach it. I will close.

Your Liberal friend, MABEL COCHRANE.

BENJAMIN, UTAH, July 15, 1891.

DEAR MISS SUSAN H. WIXON: I hav not written to you for some time, so I thought I would take my pen in hand again. In my last letter you told me to tell you how the bees made the honey; but they do not make the honey, they gather it from the flowers. They are gathering honey now, and we are all of us just as busy as can be extracting. We hav an automatic extractor. Papa is the largest bee-keeper in Benjamin, and he has had the bees' picture taken. There will be one of them come at the same time as this letter for you. Please excuse bad writing and bad spelling. Yours truly,

LOUIE HONE.

[Thanks for picture. That is "papa" in the foreground, and Louie in the doorway. So we hav their pictures as well as the homes of the busy bees. It must be a little heaven out there, where one may feast on bread and honey all the livelong day.

How doth the little busy bee
Improve each shining hour,
And gather honey all the day
From every opening flower.

—ED. C. C.]

SHERMAN, MICH., July 9, 1891.

DEAR MISS WIXON AND CORNERITES: I will try and write once more to you and find out, if I can, what is the matter with all of you Cornerites. Some of you study history, I am sure, so please answer the questions I asked in my last letter. They are not hard. And I would wager nearly every Cornerite can answer them. And when you answer them please ask some history questions.

Since I wrote last I hav had a letter from Miss Gardener. I received it a few days after my letter appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER. She asked me about our molasses, or rather maple syrup. I sent her one gallon and she sent me the book entitled, "A Thoughtless Yes." I hav read it through and think it very nice. Miss Gardener paid ninety cents express on the syrup, so you see she paid pretty dear for it, as the book is $1, making $1.90 for one gallon of syrup.

Where did you celebrate the Fourth? I celebrated at home working in the garden. Didn't I do well? How many of you girls hav flowers this summer? My sister and I hav quite a few. I hav some carnation pinks which are very pretty. They hav a very pleasant odor too.

We hav about two hundred little chickens now.

We are having quite warm weather nowadays and not much rain.

I attend Sunday-school about every Sunday. I do not think it harms me any, though, as I am very stubborn about believing things I do not know to be facts. Besides, the teacher of the class I belong to does not believe the Bible or things to be taught in Sunday-school to be true any more than I. Do you think it harms me any, Miss Wixon?

I received a Chicago Liberal, and think it very nice.

I thought the biography of Chaucer by Ida A. Ballou in the last TRUTH SEEKER very interesting. But I must close and giv room to some more interesting writer. Besides, I know such a letter cannot be welcome.

Remember the history questions.

THE
French Invasion of Ireland in '98.

Leaves of Unwritten History That Tell of a Heroic Endeavor and a Lost Opportunity to Throw Off England's Yoke.

By VALERIAN GRIBAYEDOFF.

With a map and numerous illustrations by well-known artists. Handsomely bound in silk cloth. Ink and gold side stamps. Price, $1.50.

The present volume is an effort to rescue from comparativ oblivion one of the many extraordinary episodes of the great French revolutionary war. . . . It points a moral that amidst republican institutions like ours, will not fail receive appreciation. It shows, on one hand, the elevating influence of newly acquired ambition, . . . and on the other the debasing effects of Religious and Political intolerance both on the tyrant and the victim. Contains a heretofore unpublished letter of Thomas Paine to the French Directory.

Sent by mail postpaid.

Tributes. There hav been so many applications for Mr. Ingersoll's "The Vision of War," the "Grant Banquet Toast," that they hav been printed on heavy toned paper, 18x22, illuminated border, and in large, clear type, suitable for framing, and the three will be forwarded to any address, for 25 cts, or either one for 15 cts.

Prose Poems and Selections. This new book is a gem. It is a model in every respect. In fact, one of the richest, brightest, best ever issued. It contains, besides the celebrated "Decoration Day Oration," never before published, and all the famous "tributes" heretofore printed in various shapes, but never brought together till now, many other gems, selected from the speeches, arguments, lectures, letters, table-talks, and day-to-day conversations of the author. The work is designed for and will be accepted by admiring friends as a rare personal souvenir. To help it serve this purpose, a fine steel portrait, with autograph fac simile, has been prepared especially for it. Price, in silk cloth, beveled edges, gilt back and side, $2.50; in half calf, mottled edges, elegant library style, 4.50; in full Turkey morocco, gilt, exquisitly fine, 7.50; in full tree calf, highest possible style and finish, $9.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. Price 25 cents.

News of the Week.

THE pope has approved the exhibition at Treves of the coat which the church affirms to be the one worn by Christ at the cross, for which the soldiers drew lots. The pope has also guaranteed forgivness of sins to pilgrims thither. Three steamers with pilgrims from America hav arrived.

THE United States attorney-general has instructed all district attorneys to prosecute trusts.

KOCH has resigned all public offices, perhaps because of disappointment at failure of his "tuberculin."

THE Italian consul at New Orleans has been ordered home to furnish an exact account of events since Hennessey's murder.

ANDREW CARNEGIE has given great offense in England and Scotland by unfavorable comparisons of British with American institutions.

SCIENTISTS are considering extermination of caterpillars, chinch bugs, and cut-worms by spreading among them bacterial and other contagious diseases.

THE Russian synod has decided that Jewish advocates who become Christianized shall not be allowed to practice their profession until three years after baptism.

MEXICO has departed from democratic canons in its new jury law, which requires property and educational qualifications. Its aim is to secure better intelligence.

THE congregation of the Presbyterian church at Greenville, Pa., fell into a panic last Sunday when the steeple was struck during service, but afterward joined in thanksgiving for their escape.

THE Farmers' Alliance and allied organizations will convene at Topeka August 20th to arrange coöperativ control of produce and exchange of supplies.

THE New York News, having been indicted for reporting details of the late execution, will make a fight with its co-dailies against the law infringing liberty of the press.

THE conference of English Catholics gave much testimony corroborativ of the declaration of the Holy See that marriages between Catholics and Protestants are execrable and detestable.

TWO Berlin physicians are found to hav experimented on hospital patients with cancer germs. They plead that animals would hav been unfit, and that the patients experimented on were incurables.

IN retaliation of Commissioner Morgan's attempt to oust Catholic Indian schools, the leading Catholic organ in America says that "no Catholic vote should be placed for an administration and a party which put Morgan . . . in office."

THOMAS NUTTING, a widely known and respected insurance broker of New York, has been crazed by religious excitement at the Market Street Mission, and on the 25th ult. was taken to an asylum, shouting as he was carried off, "Tell my wife I'm not crazy. God will save Morristown!"

THE latest Catholic vilification of Mazzini for stripping the pope and uniting Italy, is the declaration of the Catholic polemicist Mooney that Mazzini was "one of the most consummate liars that has ever darkened the shadow of the earth," and that when his true life is written we shall be astounded "at the villainy that can be concentrated in a human soul."

THE American consul at Morocco has issued a proclamation beginning, "Citizens of the United States: Those under the jurisdiction of this consulate are hereby informed that the Moorish government has officially notified me that, all sorts of gaming being against their religion, it is strictly forbidden." He adds that the regulation will be enforced, imprisonment one to five years being the penalty.

AT Vaudreuil, a summer resort near Montreal, the other Sunday two hundred aristocratic men and women had a rough-and-tumble fight in a hotel parlor, the room being wrecked and the floor strewn with tatters of costly gowns. The factions were Catholic and Protestant, and the difficulty was the desire of the former to hav a dance Sunday night and of the latter to hav preaching.

Gems of Thought.

THE great opponent to progress is conservatism; in other words, the great adversary of invention is imitation.—Poe.

WHEN science is led by the hand of power, it will produce great and happy effects upon the well-being of society.—Napoleon Bonaparte.

THE LAST OF MOSES'S SNAKE.

He removed the high places, and brake the images, and cut down the groves, and brake in pieces the brazen serpent that Moses had made: for unto those days the children of Israel did burn incense to it: and he called it Nesushtan.—2 Kings xviii, 4.

WE know now that the Bible cannot be used as the foundation of government. It is capable of too many meanings. Nobody can find out exactly what it upholds, what it permits, what it denounces, what it denies.—Ingersoll.

IN society, he is not the best member who can bring about the most good, but he that can accomplish it with the least admixture of concomitant ill. For let no man presume to think that he can devise any plan of extensiv good, unalloyed and unadulterated with evil.—Colton.

IF the Bible does not teach it [the doctrin of hell], then God's word has misled his people for eighteen centuries; and the Holy Ghost has been "leading into all" error, and it is not a safe guide, for the next generation may prove it spoke falsely to us about something else.—Robert C. Adams.

IT is a fact that has long been placed beyond all doubt, that morality and the church, nay morality and religion, are things perfectly independent of each other, and that the most efficient agencies of morality in the world are education, training, prosperity and freedom.—Buchner.

IN every large town all friends of humanity should unite for the enforcement of Sunday freedom, and spare no pains to brand the Sabbath bigots as enemies of the human race.—Oswald.

BRAVAS to all impulses sending sane children to the next age!
But damn that which spends itself with no thought of the stain, pains, dismay, feebleness, it is bequeathing.
—Walt Whitman.

MEN of letters, who hav rendered the most service to the small number of thinking beings scattered over the earth, are isolated scholars, true sages shut up in their closets, who hav neither publicly disputed in the universities, nor said things by halves in the academies; and such hav almost all been persecuted. Our miserable race is so created, that those who walk in the beaten path always throw stones at those who would show them a new one.—Voltaire.

IF a man of science were told that the results of his experiments, and the conclusions that he arrived at, should be of such a character that they would not upset the received popular notions on the subject, or disturb popular prejudice, or hurt the sensibilities of people who knew nothing about science; if a philosopher were told that he had a perfect right to speculate in the highest spheres of thought, provided that he arrived at the same conclusions as were held by those who had never thought in any sphere at all—well, nowadays, the man of science and the philosopher would be considerably amused. Yet it was really a very few years since both philosophy and science were subjected to brutal popular control, to authority in fact—the authority of either the general ignorance of the community, or the terror and greed for power of an ecclesiastical or governmental class.—Oscar Wilde.

THE spirit of intolerance was only sustained by the diffusion of countless libels against the misbeliever, and by systematic concealment of his virtues. How sedulously theologians at that time labored in this task, how unscrupulously they maligned and blackened every leading opponent of their views, how eagerly they fanned the flame of sectarian animosity, how uniformly they prohibited those whom they could influence from studying the writings or frequenting the society of men of different opinions from their own, is well known to all who are acquainted with ecclesiastical history. The first great blow to this policy was given by the rise of the commercial classes that followed the Crusades. Orthodox Catholics came into close and amicable connection both with Greeks and with Mohammedans, while their new pursuit made them, for the first time, look with favor upon the Jews.—Lecky.

Notes and Clippings.

"CAN lying be justified?" asks the Courier-Journal. Justified? Why, down this way, if it is on the right side, it can be sanctified.—Waco Day.

FASHION is changing even the British Sunday from a day to be observed with punctilious attendance at church and precise and formal dress into an occasion for lounging in boating and tennis flannels.

SAYS Archbishop Fabre to Joliette College, Montreal, students: "We should be happy to liv in a country where religion is so respected." He adds: "Don't go to Paris to terminate your studies; it is always dangerous to faith."

THE exhibitions of the coat of Jesus hav always been attended by almost countless throngs, and an enormous influx of pilgrims to Treves is expected in August. The Rhine railways are preparing for the service. They expect to carry 40,000 passengers daily.

AFTER all there is nothing novel in the rejection of a part of the Bible by the school of advanced thought. The Jews reject all but the Old Testament, and Infidels reject it altogether.—Herald. And it is the Infidels that hav brought "the school of advanced thought" to this rejection.

THE oldest thing about Col. Robert G. Ingersoll, according to the Indianapolis reporters, is his spectacles. In other respects his kindly, smooth-shaven face is as youthful as ever, and he retains the genial, hearty manner that made him a charming companion before he became a famous orator.—World.

KING LEOPOLD of Belgium has been in correspondence with the pope in regard to the introduction of the universal liability to service in Belgium. He asked the holy father to exercise his influence with Belgian Catholics toward impressing on them the necessity and advantages of this military regulation, and cited as a precedent for such action the support given to the Berlin government by the pope when the question of the Septennate was before the Reichstag.

THE Jewish element in this city, says the Sun, does not appear to be interested in the "mammoth petition" to the powers of Europe in favor of a conference to bring about the establishment of Palestine as a Jewish nation. "The Turkish government," says an intelligent Jew, "must be broken in pieces and destroyed, before it will giv up its Asiatic possessions, and the European powers know full well that this would involve them all in a tremendous war. We shall yet get possession of Palestine, but we must wait till the twentieth century for it, and a mammoth petition from America cannot be of any account."

THE clergymen of at least one religious denomination enjoy long life in this wicked world, according to the statistics just published in the Congregationalist Year Book. The number of clergymen of the American Congregational church who died last year was ninety-nine, and their average age was seventy-one years and four months, or more than twice the average age of the other people who constitute the general community. In the fifteen years from 1875 to 1890, the number of Congregational clergymen who died in this country was one thousand two hundred and sixty-one, and their average age was one month more than sixty-eight years, which is still far beyond the average age of other people.

IT is rare that any one of the Chinese residents of this city becomes a Christian. Great efforts hav been made to convert them. Many meetings hav been held for that purpose; societies hav been got up to instruct them in the gospel; missionaries hav labored among them, and sermons hav been preached to them in their own language. A few of them will sometimes be drawn to a meeting; they will listen to what is said, and make no objection to it; but they depart without giving any sign that even the slightest impression has been made upon their minds. They remain pagans after hearing about Christianity; they cling to the superstitions of their race; they do not giv up the ancient ceremonies of their own religion, and they still worship Joss.

THE death rate from consumption has fallen thirty per cent in England in the last thirty years. Of course there has been no material change in the climate of the country, and the quantity of smoke and noxious gases poured into the air has increased. A larger portion of the people of England liv in towns and cities now, and atmospheric conditions are less favorable to health, if anything. The great decrease in the death rate from consumption, therefore, shows how much drainage, public cleanliness, and other sanitary measures count for in abating the most deadly of all diseases. Proper household surroundings, good food and clothing, and temperate living hav much more power to ward off consumption than medicin or climate.

IT is tonic to read of Locomotiv Engineer Todd out in Iowa. An obstruction had been put on his track to wreck his train; his fireman jumped and saved himself, but Todd stayed to shut off steam, set the air brakes, and open the sand valves. Then he went over with and under his engin. They got him out and he came to asking if any of the passengers were hurt. When they told him No, he smiled and remarked, "This is a glorious Fourth we're having, isn't it. I'm afraid I had too many fireworks." He died shortly afterward, adds the dispatch simply. Pursuing his immortal part in thought, it is agreeable to believe that it was not foreordained for the glory of God to everlasting hell-fire.—Sun. But if creeds are true the chances are heavy that his "immortal part" was preordained to hell-fire.

PROF. MARK BALDWIN, of the department of psychology of the University of Toronto, writes: "The man of the future will liv amid conditions of enormous complexity. The accumulation of scientific details will tend to paralyze constructiv genius. There must exist, therefore, between men of detail and men of invention a sharper distinction. Men of detail will write summaries, indices, encyclopedias, compile synopses, and make researches. Men of invention will be rarer, grander, more removed from ordinary comprehension. Yet there can be no doubt that such men will arise, and nature will be mastered in a way of which we now can only dream. In the industrial world a single man of genius may any day let in the light of which the Socialistic theories of to-day are only the faintest glimmerings. And so it is in every department of human interest and inquiry."

A SPECIAL correspondent sent by the London Times to investigate the negro question thinks that if the problem is let alone, and the prevailing conditions and influences are allowed to continue indefinitly, a time will come when all compromises and shifts must break down, and when recourse must be had to the final arbitration of the sword, as in the case of slavery. To avoid this is the duty of the American people; but there is only one way of avoiding it, and that is by removing the negro from the country. Such removal, however, is clearly conditioned. In the first place, it must be voluntary. In the second place, it must be assisted. In the third place, it must involve no loss or injury to the emigrants, but on the contrary must giv them assurance of greater prosperity elsewhere. The region naturally pointed out as the goal of the migration, Mr. Clowes thinks, is the Congo Free States. But it is essential that there shall be no further experiments in negro self-government. The experiences of Liberia and Hayti hav settled that question. The negro must be governed in order to do the best for himself. Any other plan will result in simple anarchy. As to the expense of the exodus, it would hav to be borne—or at least the bulk of it—by the country; and it would cost a great deal.

J. M. GUARDIA, the greatest living authority on Spanish civilization and character, being asked what Spain can do for progress, writes of: "Two scourges—greedy functionaries, covetous priests. Public instruction that is ridiculous, fossil academies. Neither savants nor philosophers; art debased, the language degenerated. A literature of imitation or of foreign print. Madrid devours without producing. Property, commerce, industry ruined by taxes; life swayed by passion; reason drowsy between ignorance and superstition. Spain does not know her history. The Inquisition, the expulsion of the Jews and of the Moors, the foundation of Loyola, the extermination of the Protestants, the conquest of America, the government of the colonies, the follies and crimes of two fatal dynasties, the laxity of morals, the stupid pride, the systematic isolation, principal causes of her profound misery—that is what the national education should not forget. Spain is cruelly expiating her misdeeds. May she renounce fanaticism, sloth, and parasitism; may she be impassioned for truth, liberty, right, in reparation for her faults and for time lost."

NOT a little excitement occurred last year on the reported discovery in Naples of some nuns immersed in a convent entirely walled up, so that no communication with the outside world was possible. The Sepolte vive, or buried alive, as they were entitled, were said to be horribly destitute. At the vigorous instigation of the public authorities the pope commanded the nuns to leave their hermit-like prison and to repair to whatsoever convent they preferred. This order was obeyed on the 30th of April at 6 in the morning. The place was afterward described as consisting of two stories and a corridor on which there were seven cells. The nuns used to remain in these cells for the whole day, every day in the week, in silent prayer. They held no communication with anyone, save in urgent cases, when they were allowed to ring a bell, when one of the sisters came from the adjoining convent, and communication was held with her through a small window. A mason who had to be admitted to execute some indispensable work, declared that the nuns never spoke to one another, and seemed to be buried in sadness. There were short written phrases on the walls of some of the cells, but the writing seemed to be centuries old.

A DISPATCH from Green Cove Springs, Fla., to the Sun reads: "This town is in the midst of one the most successful watermelon revivals ever known in the South. The unusual fervor of the excitement is said to be the result of the exceptionally fine melon crop, which, in quality and quantity, surpasses anything seen here in recent years. As a consequence household operations are at a complete standstill, and business of every kind is seriously interfered with. The white residents are so seriously affected by the melon revival, in consequence of the impossibility of getting any service done by the colored sisters, that some of them do not hesitate to speak impatiently of the whole business and to declare that those who get the most religion also collar the most melons from the white man's patch; and now and then a sister who has seen many melon revivals and is thus prepared to take a conservativ view of the situation, replies: 'Well, I 'spects that's so.' All of the white residents are looking forward somewhat impatiently to the closing of the melon season and the synchronous completion of the religious work; not because they mind the loss of a few melons, but because they greatly need the services of those who at all times, barring this period of annual occurrences, are faithful and valued servants."

"NICARAGUA," writes a traveler, "is an intensely religious country. At Greytown I missed the closing scenes of the Passion play, enacted in the bare plaza and the sacred precincts of 'Jerusalem.' The triumphal entry under palm branches, the last supper, the trial before Pilate, the mocking, scourging, and crucifixion between thieves, and the resurrection meeting with the holy women are reproduced there with startling realism. In the western towns religious processions take the place of this crude Passion play. A large image is strapped upon a mule on Palm Sunday and escorted by priests, soldiers, and bands of music through the streets. On Thursday and Friday there are processions with as many as twenty or thirty images dressed in purple and black. Hundreds of men and women join in the parade behind the hearse, and carry lighted candles which hav been blessed for the occasion and are supposed to possess peculiar sanctity. The bands play dirges, the garrison marches to drum-beats, and the torch-bearers enter the altar. Business is suspended during these solemn days, and the running of railway trains is prohibited by the government."

THE case of the English girl, Katie Green, on the Persian frontier, has raised a storm. It would hav been by no means for the first time if the religious aspect of the story had to be only solved by a widespread appeal to arms. Here was a girl born in an Eastern country, of half Occidental parentage, who, her father being dead, was brought up by an Armenian mother amid wholly un-English surroundings. A Koordish lover wooes her according to the traditions of his race, and carries her off. From first to last it was never alleged that the maiden was an unwilling captiv. Then the religious question was raised and all the English-speaking Christians, attracted by the girl's English name, became excited and alarmed, and, finally, after standing a siege by two hostil armies, the Koordish lover was forced to retire discomfited without his bride. The thought that this girl might marry a Moslem, thus embracing Islam in the fullest sense of the word, was so abhorrent to the ministers of Christianity that they were prepared to resist or avenge the sacrilege with the sword, and in defense of the privileges of the church shed any quantity of blood. Yet this is in a country overrun by bands of English and American missionaries, who strive by every means in their power, and deem all means legitimate, to wean Moslem youth from the faith of their fathers.

THERE is no directory in the city of St. Petersburg. The government, for obvious reasons, cannot allow such a work to be published. In the first place, the publisher, a private business man, would hav to put himself into communication with the entire population of the city gathering their names and addresses. If he or his agents should hav any "nonconforming" (raskolnik) views, they might hav a chance to advocate them. The government cannot allow that. Besides, it is a matter of concern to the police to know who calls on whom. Suspicious persons are noticed by and known to the police, who also desire to know the persons who hav any dealings with them. Instead of a city directory, which might be kept open at every drugstore or office of any importance, there is in St. Petersburg one central address-bureau. The clerks of that establishment are Tchinovniks, city officials, bound to work hand in hand with the police. If you desire to find out the address of any inhabitant you must go to the bureau for it, hand the name of the man you inquire for in your own handwriting to any of the clerks, and you will get his address on a slip of paper. If the person you seek is an object of suspicion to the police you may depend on it that your business with him will be diligently inquired into. Since January women clerks hav been placed in the address-bureau, and the men whose places they take are transferred to other city offices.—Sun.

The Church and Learning.

The following is a selection from the remarks of Rev. S. Van Scoy, of the Methodist educational convention that met in Portland, Ore., June 10th and 11th, and was reported in the Oregonian:

Every person in his earlier years has his period of religious doubt. That period is usually when one is from fifteen to twenty years of age. It is the great problem of the education of this period to see to it that the minds of our youth finally at the close of this period find a true anchorage. Better the young man should hav no college education than in attaining it should be wrecked on the sands of skepticism. Another reason why the church should look after this work is that all that is possible to be done with a young life, in a university career, is afforded by the church. If a young person passes through college without becoming a Christian, he is almost beyond religious influence and control. The college should hav spiritual power to anchor every student to truth and to Christ.

By this quotation anyone can see that the arguments of the creed-expounders are not potent enough to sway the mature and educated mind. A religion whose advocates must seek out the minors, the children, with whom to make contracts, is suggestiv of humbug if not more. In the twelfth century Abelard declared that understanding should precede belief; and Christianity, as she persecuted Abelard, has ever since persecuted his formula of Rationalism.

Unblushingly is the statement made that many universities allow no skeptics on their boards; and it might hav been added, no Rationalistic periodicals in their reading-rooms.

Methodist college seniors can be found who never heard of Herbert Spencer and are ignorant of the writings of Huxley, Tyndall, Darwin, and Haeckel.

Skeptically inclined students are often warned that such views, regardless of scholarship, will prevent them from obtaining positions after graduation, and consequently many array themselvs on the side of religion.

The remark of one of the delegates to the effect that university administration should see that skepticism and Rationalism are forever shut out substantiates my statement that to a great extent the undergraduate is tempted with a bribe and threatened with a boycott to profess Christianity and abjure Rationalism.

Why do the clergy single out Rationalism even if its philosophy is absurd? The bigotry that would hear no plea, but shut it out, must be narrow indeed. Do the clergy fear to hav the student gain a knowledge of Buddhism, Brahmanism, Mohammedanism, or the teachings of Zoroaster or Confucius, lest he chain his faith to one of these? Where is the shutting out to end that begins with shutting out Rationalism? Writings of eminent theologians like Paulus and Strauss will hav to be kept out of the student's reach, and after all that Christianity has declared skeptical is shut out the students would be forced to establish an inquisition in every university to enforce disciplin.

Any clergyman who feels competent to cope with the philosophy of Rationalism would not wish to lose the glory of a victory over it. He would bid its exponents enter that he might vanquish them with his arguments. But the clergy, conscious of the infirmity of their creeds, are afraid even to undertake the task of converting the Rationalist.

When Rev. T. B. Chirrington quotes history, we do not wonder that he might prefer to shut out those acquainted with the history of the time of which he speaks. These are his words:

The apostles had scarcely started on their mission when schools became a necessity to the church.

The learning of the pagan Greeks for fifteen hundred years after apostolic times found no parallel in Christian Europe.

The Christian emperor, Theodosius the Great, about the close of the fourth century, destroyed a large part of the Alexandrian library. Soon after this Hypatia, the last Alexandrian mathematician, was murdered by a Christian mob. In the year 529 A.D. the Christian emperor, Justinian, drove out the pagan scholars from Athens, and declared that pagan learning should no longer be taught.

In the schools of Christian Constantine, murderer of his family and founder of the Sabbath, (also in the schools of Charlemagne) it was deemed high scholarship to be able to calculate the feast-days of the church.

Prof. W. W. R. Ball, in his "History of Mathematics," page 103, says:

The fate of Hypatia may serve to remind us that the Christians as soon as they became the dominant party in the state showed themselvs bitterly hostil to all forms of learning. . . . The final establishment of Christianity in the East marks the end of the Greek scientific schools, though they nominally continued to exist for two hundred years more.

The same work, page 109, also "Chambers' Encyclopedia," speaks of the partial destruction of the library by the Christians.

Hallam, "The Middle Ages," says:

The fourth council of Carthage, in 398, prohibited the reading of secular books by bishops. Jerome plainly condemns the study of them except for pious ends. All physical science especially was held in avowed contempt as inconsistent with revealed truths. Nor do there appear to hav been any canons made in favor of learning or any restriction on the ordination of persons absolutely illiterate [during the third, fourth, and fifth centuries].

Again, says Hallam:

Schools, confined to cathedrals and monasteries, and exclusivly designed for the purposes of religion, afforded no encouragement or opportunities to the laity. . . . For many centuries, to sum up the account of ignorance in a word, it was rare for a layman of whatsoever rank to know how to sign his name. . . . Still more extraordinary it was to find anyone who had a tincture of learning. Even admitting every indistinct commendation of a monkish biographer, with whom a knowledge of church music would pass as literature, we could make out a very short list of scholars; none certainly were more distinguished as such than Charlemeign and Alfred.

It seems to the writer that Hallam in this connection should hav mentioned Alcuin, whose merits as an educator in the schools of Charlemagne were due more to his acquaintance with the works of Boethius, of the fifth and sixth century, than to his Christianity. Boethius, the last distinguished scholar of the Roman empire, studied the science and literature of the Greeks. Alfred the Great studied the works of Boethius. And through Boethius were handed down to future generations the geometry of Euclid and the philosophy of Aristotle. Boethius was more of a Roman than a Christian. He stood as a connecting link to bridge the dark gulf of Christianity; on one side of him the wealth of Greek learning, on the other the dawn of Rationalism.

The tenth century was the midnight of the Dark Ages. Christianity expected the end of the world in the year 1000. The date was passed; the prophets were in error.

We read on, and Hallam tells us that "Charlemeign, unless we reject a very plain testimony, was incapable of writing, and Alfred found difficulty in making a translation from the pastoral instructions of St. Gregory on account of an imperfect knowledge of Latin."

St. Gregory, who lived in the third century, received a pagan education and afterward became a Christian. Speaking generally of the Dark Ages, Hallam says:

A cloud of ignorance overspread the whole face of the church, hardly broken by a few glimmering lights who owe much of their distinction to the surrounding darkness. . . . In almost every council the ignorance of the clergy forms a subject for reproach. It was asserted by one held in 992 that scarcely a person could be found in Rome itself who knew the first elements of letters. Not one priest in a thousand in Spain about the age of Charlemeign could address a common letter of salutation to another.

Small consolation can be found in the statement of one of the Portland divines, that "cathedral and monastery schools were the germs of the great European universities." When the monasteries were filled with copies of the writings of pagan scholars, that men should liv in mental blindness, surrounded by these books, is proof enough of their indifference, not to say hatred, toward literature and science.

That everyone was thus guilty of indifference we do not pretend, but when men began, after the year 1000, to direct their attention to letters, they ran the risk of being charged by the conservativ body of the church with heresy, sorcery, or magic, and this meant persecution or perhaps death.

To Abelard more than any other man is due the honor of founding the first European university, namely that of Paris.

He was persecuted for laying down the principle, that "nothing is to be believed that has not been first understood." The doctrins advocated by Abelard had a decided Rationalistic tendency and were declared heretical. Other men within the church began to grope for light; the Lord could furnish none, the scriptures thus far had allowed every generation to plunge into deeper darkness.

The neglected and proscribed writings of Aristotle were touched even as the forbidden fruit. Copies of Euclid were exhumed, and thus Abelard, Lombard, Albertus Magnus, Roger Bacon, and Oakham risked their lives to resurrect learning, toward the founding of universities. As long as Christianity left the hated pagan manuscripts untouched she wallowed in her mire of ignorance and blood; she battered out the brains of pagan women wiser than her Jesus; but she had to do homage to pagan mathematics, arts, and sciences, or dwindle into blank barbarity. No professed Infidel could liv in the dark years when the universities were first established. Science was in fetters, but as pagan learning began to resurrect, the fetters loosened.

University learning became of broader scope, and Infidels and inventors became more plentiful, each suffering like persecutions.

Paper manufacture and the printing-press, the compass and the discovery of America, not encouraged, were condemned by the church; all tended to stimulate literature and science. If Luther's Reformation helped in the same direction, then let us hav more of this rebellion from ecclesiastical authority. But we are not yet done with paganism, in counting her scholarship the parent of ours.

Descartes blended Arab algebra with the geometry of the Greek, and it was only a step for Newton to formulate the calculus and build from Euclidian blocks the Principia.

Mathematics revived, mechanics soon found her inventors, who, even by their labors on the Sabbath, to say nothing of the other week-days, hav given to mankind more than the clergy had taken from them.

Though the boldest Rationalists to-day, if they chance to be poor men, are inconvenienced in a business way by friction with the religious ring, Rationalism, in spite of the froth of a few bigots, permeates the press and even the university, and she will not be shut out from any places whatsoever. She may be often silent, but mankind are thinking now, and in the pulpit philosophy and politics take precedence of prayer.

When Rev. T. B. Ford says, "Let the churches furnish schools of higher education and control them," he means not all he says, for he has no objection if people outside the church furnish the money. There are plenty of sectarian colleges that were nursed freely by municipal money, while only a small per cent of the donations that hav built such schools has been furnished by the sect that claims all the honor of being the founder and guardian of them.

Remarks like the following might excite a smile, but they carry little weight: "Piety and true science go hand in hand everywhere. Science and the prayer-meeting go together." Count the civil engineers, architects, chemists, lawyers, physicians, editors, and authors that always attend prayer-meeting and those who do not attend at all. Observe if there is not more profanity than prayer in the language of the best men of these professions? Were La Place, Humboldt, Darwin, Haeckel pious?

Piety asserts that there is an intelligent creativ and governing power, supernatural, called God. Science teaches that matter or force are increatable as well as indestructible. That limit to either as to existence is as inconceivable as limit to space.

We can formulate all transformations of energy, finding mathematical relations existing always between successiv phenomena, therefore it is rational to conclude that the accounts of nature are self-balancing, her mechanism automatic or self-governing.

It was stated at the convention that no university dare avow itself Infidel. Yet the very theology of to-day in our universities would hav been declared Infidel a century ago. The very men whose names hav made their universities famous hav ever been departing from the conservativ ruts of theology.

In German literature and theology no name since Lessing is more famous than that of Strauss, and for his Rationalism he was deposed from his professorship at Sürbingen.

Even Lessing tired of the study of theology at Leipsig in 1746, and turned his attention to the "sinful" drama, a rather poor compliment to theology from Germany's greatest prose writer.

Priestley's discoveries in science, his Infidelity and persecution by Christians, are generally well known.

Heidelburg offered Spinoza the liberty of teaching provided he would say nothing against the established religion, but Spinoza did not honor Heidelburg with his services.

To learn how those who were not Infidels tried to howl down every advance in the sciences of geology and philology one may read Professor White's "Warfare of Science" in the Popular Science Monthly. It has been the searching eye of skepticism that first has spied the germs of science. Quite naturally a man best serves the world he loves best.

In the words of Strauss, "Christianity as such never rose above crusades and persecutions of heretics. It has never even attained to tolerance, which yet is merely the negativ side of universal benevolence."

Darwin says: "Belief inculcated during the early years of life, while the brain is impressible, appears to acquire almost the nature of an instinct, and the very essence of an instinct is that it is followed independently of reason."

Judging from these quotations, it is the rule of Christianity to be intolerant. As stated by the speakers of the convention, the subject for conversion to Christianity must be taken young. According to Darwin, beliefs early impressed partake of the nature of instinct, which being the case, we do not wonder that George Grote, the historian and Rationalist, remarked:

The clergy hav the strongest interest in the depravation of the human intellect. For the demand for their services as agents for the temporal aid of the deity altogether depends upon human ignorance and incapacity, and is exactly proportional to it.

We may almost reduce the argument to this statement. Ignorance is the only soil in which the seeds of Christianity, or more broadly, superstition, may be successfully planted. The clergy are to be the planters; the soil, the mind of childhood.

College professors are not as pious as the clergy would make them appear. Generally they hav very little to say upon the subject of religion. The reason is evident: they are forced to wear the ecclesiastical bridle held by the hands that hold the salaries.

Like inventors, scientific men are not usually financiers; but the clergy, clever in the art of canvassing for charity, particularly around the deathbeds of the wealthy dying, hold the capital of universities more or less within their grasp. It is for the clergy to say what shall not be taught; it is for the professors to teach all they dare to.

Governments hav found the church an undesirable associate by experience, and doubtless universities will learn the same lesson ultimately in the same way. C. E. BOYNTON, B.S., M.D.

An Episcopalian on a Presbyterian Heretic.

Howard MacQueary in the Sun.

Whatever Dr. Briggs himself is, it may easily be shown that his views are those of the Rationalist. His opponents are perfectly clear on this point, and it is his Rationalism that offends them. The spirit and method of their attacks upon him are abominable, but they do not err in their apprehension of his opinions. Let me examin those opinions in detail, as explained so fully by the doctor himself.

First: He is an enthusiastic advocate of the "higher criticism" of the scriptures, and this criticism is nothing if not Rationalistic. It treats the Bible just as it does the Vedas, the Avesta, or any other document. It inquires, Who wrote the books of the Bible, when were they written, are they true? In other words, reason sits in judgment on scripture, and accepts or rejects its various parts according as they do or do not commend themselvs to this judge. Dr. Briggs not only adopts the methods of the higher criticism, but he accepts many of its most "advanced" conclusions. Thus, he says: "It may be regarded as the certain result of the science of the higher criticism that Moses did not write the Pentateuch or Job; Ezra did not write Chronicles, Ezra, or Nehemiah; Jeremiah did not write the Kings or Lamentations; David did not write the Psalter, but only a few of the Psalms; Solomon did not write the Song of Songs or Ecclesiastes, and only a portion of the Proverbs; Isaiah did not write half of the book that bears his name. The great mass of the Old Testament was written by authors whose names or connection with their writings are lost in oblivion." These are the conclusions of many of the most pronounced Rationalists of Germany and England. They clearly show which way Dr. Briggs is facing; what his method of biblical study is.

Secondly, Dr. Briggs vehemently rejects the theory of the verbal inspiration of the scriptures. He rightly brands it as a modern invention of dogmaticians. His position on this subject, however, is most unsatisfactory to all parties. He really seems to juggle with phrases. Everybody knows, of course, that thought may be expressed, and actually is expressed, by various sorts of words and languages. "The words of scripture," says Dr. Briggs, "may be compared to vessels, symbols, shells, a wine glass, or a lantern." Illustrations often mislead instead of illustrating, and so, I think, these expressions do not express sense. Try to imagin a thought incased in a word. Think of the word as a vessel, a wine glass, and the thought as something essentially distinct within the word, and you at once see the ambiguity of Dr. Briggs's idea on this subject. Words simply are uttered thoughts, and, although the printed characters exhibiting to the eye these uttered thoughts may vary in form, yet they must exactly express the thoughts or they are erroneous and misleading. The words, therefore, are valued by the verbal inspirationists and by others simply and only because they express thoughts. What they claim is not that Hebrew, Greek, and Latin words are the only words that could convey inspired thoughts, but that, as a matter of fact, they do convey such thoughts, and when it is shown that these words are contradicted by other words then they and their "contents" (whatever that word may mean as used by Dr. Briggs) are contradicted, and therefore false. They are perfectly right in maintaining that the authority of scripture is sapped just as soon as it is admitted that its words may be erroneous but its sense true; for each one may then read into the words any sense or nonsense he chooses. I am perfectly aware that various theories of inspiration are held by even evangelical theologians, and therefore Dr. Briggs has as much right to formulate his own theory as anybody else. But it is also certain that if the inspiration of the scriptures is so variable and uncertain a quantity that all sorts of theories about it may be framed, it ceases to be of much practical value. The plain truth is, Dr. Briggs and his school, having adopted the methods of historical criticism and holding that the divine spirit's influence has not been confined to the Bible writers, find themselvs in the dilemma of trying to uphold the unique character of our sacred writings, when, in fact, they are of a piece with other religious documents. Instead, therefore, of juggling with theories of inspiration they should say simply: "The question is not primarily, are the scriptures inspired, but rather are they true? If they are true, then they are not authoritativ. If they are partly true and partly false, then the question is, What parts are true, what false?" This is the only tenable position for the Briggs school.

Thirdly. Dr. Briggs says, truly, "Biblical criticism finds errors in holy scriptures in great numbers. These errors are in the circumstantials, and not in the essentials." The first is a statement of fact; the second is simply Dr. Briggs's opinion, and hence the two statements should be carefully distinguished. According to one author not only is the sense of holy writ different, or at least distinct, from its words, but there are errors in it which no one has ever been able to explain away.

It is logically concluded that an authority containing many errors is no divine authority. Imagin a Roman Catholic saying: "The pope is the infallible authority in faith and morals, but the sense of his words must be distinguished from the words themselvs, and although he has made many mistakes, he is yet an unquestionable authority!" Such sophistry would be greeted with sneers. Then Dr. Briggs having admitted that there are numerous errors in the scriptures, must, of course, admit that each one is to decide for himself whether those errors affect the substance of revelation or only its circumstantials. I am convinced that the Bible errs in essential matters. Its errors are so great as to place the erring ones on a level with uninspired writers, and hence its unique authority is gone. Dr. Briggs himself tells us that the predictions of the prophets hav many of them been "reversed by history, and the great body of the messianic prediction has not only never been fulfilled, but cannot now be fulfilled, for the reason that its own time has passed forever." Is not such prediction an important part of prophecy? Are not such prophets placed by their mistakes on a level with such dreamers as Savonarola was? And can it be rationally maintained that such errors are unessential, do not affect the truth of revelation? I think not. Dr. Briggs says truly that if Noah, Abraham, Jacob, Judah, David, Solomon, and other such biblical characters lived now "we would not receive such men into our families," and "we might feel obliged to send them to prison, lest they should defile the community by their example." Yet large sections of scripture are taken up with eulogies of these disreputable characters! Are they not important? Slavery, polygamy, and wars of extermination are sanctioned by the Bible, and surely those passages must be set aside as erroneous. The spirit of many of the Psalms, of the song of Deborah, and other parts of the scriptures is the spirit of anger and malice. St. Paul and the other disciples expected the speedy return of Christ to earth after his death, and they were mistaken. The gospels contain many errors of incredible statement. In short, Dr. Briggs knows as well as anybody that the Bible is simply a record of the religious development of Israel and of the founding of the Christian church, and partakes of precisely the features characteristic of other such records, as the Vedas, the Avesta, etc. Why, then, attempt to set it up as the supreme rule of faith and practice?

Fourthly: Dr. Briggs's view of miracles is Rationalistic. He says, truly: "The biblical writers do not lay so much stress upon them as modern apologists. Moses and Jesus both warn their disciples against miracles that would be wrought in the interest of false prophets and false messiahs." "There is no reason," he continues, "why we should claim that they in any way violate the laws of nature or disturb its harmonies." Does Dr. Briggs believe that the birth of a child from a virgin, or the resurrection of a dead body would not in any way violate the laws of nature or disturb its harmonies? If he does, he knows nothing of the laws of nature as they appear to careful students of nature. But we can not believe that he is ignorant of such laws and we are quite sure that he is familiar with the process of manufacturing such legendary narrativs as are found in the Bible. If our author's utterances on this subject mean anything they mean that he considers the accounts of miracles in the Bible unworthy of credence except in those cases where the events related may be explained as purely natural (and therefore not miraculous) events. But the most conclusiv evidence of Dr. Briggs's Rationalism is found in his utterances about the authority of the church, the Bible, and reason. "There are," he says, "three seats of divine authority, the Bible, the church, and the reason." From this it has been naturally inferred that he placed these three sources of authority on the same level, but he has disclaimed the inference, and he is entitled to the disclaimer. "When I take this position," he assures us, "I do not deny the Protestant position that holy scripture is supreme." Upon this I remark: It seems wholly irrational to say that a book whose authorship is largely unknown, which contains numerous errors, should be a supreme authority. It is certainly nonsense to take this position when the reason is ever sitting in judgment upon the scriptures and rejecting all except those passages which commend themselvs to the reason as inspired and authoritativ. But let us grant, for the sake of argument, that this may be done; yet Dr. Briggs's setting up reason as of divine authority at all makes him a Rationalist, or at least a heretical Presbyterian. If there is one fact that has been insisted upon by Presbyterianism from its very birth to the present time, it is that man is "totally depraved in every part and faculty of soul and body." The reason, therefore, according to Augustinianism and Calvinism, is utterly impotent and degraded. Imagin God present in a wholly depraved chamber of the soul! Think of a divine authority that is utterly corrupt, as the Confession of Faith says reason is! Such an idea is self-contradictory. After this exaltation of reason we are not surprised to find Dr. Briggs rejecting the commonly accepted theories of Adam's fall and man's election. (Inaugural Address, pp. 50 and 55.) But he thereby severs himself from orthodox Presbyterianism. We entirely agree with Dr. Briggs. Why does not Dr. Briggs go to the logical extremity of his position? He knows as well as anybody that the Bible itself is simply an expression of devout reason, and the church has been built up and sustained by weak, ordinary men. Of these three sources of divine authority the reason of the present generation of man is purer and more trustworthy than the Bible or the ancient church, taken as a whole. It is refreshing to find a Presbyterian rejecting the degrading doctrin that man is totally depraved in his body and soul, and asserting the divine authority of reason. But we must insist that such an assertion robs the Bible of its supremacy in faith and morals. It may be of co-equal authority, with reason, at least those parts of it which are not erroneous may be, but it is no longer supreme.

Now, I hav no desire to make Dr. Briggs out a heretic. That name should be applied to no one, but as he has repeatedly spoken on the subject we cannot but listen, and we are obliged to take his words as expressions of his thought, and from these words we are forced to draw certain conclusions. The important fact, however, is not that Dr. Briggs holds such opinions, but that he is sustained by large numbers in the Presbyterian church. It shows that Liberal and Rational thought has pierced the solid phalanx of the Calvinists, and is spreading disunion among them. All hail, success and triumph to Dr. Briggs and his supporters! It is the dawn of a new renaissance of faith and religion.

Meanings.

Thee does not understand the beautiful occult meaning of the Bible.

Thee has not the faintest conception of its meaning.

J. M. W.

I am not at all sure anyone has or can hav an understanding of the occult meaning or real meaning of much that the old Jew-book contains.

We often fail to catch the true meaning of much that is said or penned in our own day and age, and how then can we expect to grasp the occult or any other real meaning of what was penned so many ages ago?

The whole Christian world has been busy for ages in putting meanings into Bible texts and Bible stories that probably the authors thereof had not "the faintest conception of."

Straightforward tales are twisted and turned into an occultism that would confound the authors who first penned them, even more than they will do her who pens these lines.

Will our friend W. please giv us the occult meaning of the command to sell one's coat and buy a sword, or that of Jesus where he orders that his enemies shall be brought before him and slain?

It is a very easy matter to take some good moral maxim, or some nicely worded sentence, and weave around it the beauties of poetry, romance, and art; to make of it a household word; to keep on for generations adding more and still more to its beautiful surroundings, till the associations clustered around it make of it a lovely poem, calling up all that is sweet, holy, and sacred in memory.

Surround the most filthy word or sentence you can conceive of with the beautiful thoughts and associations of a lifetime; hand it down generation after generation, and let each successiv one gracefully and earnestly thus endow it, and it will finally become worthy of being enshrined in a golden frame and hung on the sacred walls of home.

AUNT ELMINA.

A COMPARISON of the different accounts of the resurrection of Jesus reveals discrepancies that no honest harmonizing can blend into consistency with the idea that God has told us the story. Nor would any English-speaking judge accept a fact upon such testimony in a court of law. Let each write out the stories in parallel columns, and decide for himself.—Robt. C. Adams.

The American Secular Union Penny Fund.

Mr. Crihfield's five-cent piece, sent us in response to our showing what might be done for state Secularization if every Liberal in the country contributed a penny annually to the American Secular Union, has already evoked many similar contributions. One New England Liberal writes:

I never, until reading your interesting communication in the Investigator, felt that I was able to contribute anything to the Secular Union fund, although I hav many times wished I was possessed of a competency, so that I could put your working capacity to the test; rest assured I would place at your disposal not less than $1,000 as my contribution. . . . I had not supposed the small sum I could spare (being a poor man and in poor health) would be of any use; but after reading your article, I see it in a different light, and am glad to be able to send you the small sum of ten cents, and hope many others will respond to that well-put appeal.

Another ten-cent contribution from a Dana, Ill., member, ends with the cheery little postscript, "Don't get discouraged!" A Texas family of three sends five cents—the extra two "for some one who cannot send any." A New York man sends a dollar, "being," says he, "one cent for myself, and one cent each for ninety-nine Liberals that do not pay." And from Alabama comes a promis of a yearly dime, with twenty cents inclosed, since, says the sender, "I do not know but what I may be owing you for last year's dues." A Michigan Spiritualist lady says, in regard to the Secular Penny:

I hope that none of the readers of the paper will skip that article, but will read and think 'that means me,' and not neglect to send their penny. I will send a penny for myself, one for husband, one for boy, and one for boy-angel in spirit-life.

Dear, motherly woman-soul, which thus seeks to build a tender memorial of its departed, in helpful work for the living!

From Madison C. Kimball, of South Addison, N. Y., comes a dollar for the Secular Penny Fund, and the following words:

I hav just read with much interest your communication to the Progressiv Thinker, and I also hasten to aid you financially as far as my limited means will permit at present. There are five in our family, and I inclose you postal note of $1, or twenty cents per head. I do not do this to outdo Mr. Crihfield at all, but because I hav the good of the cause at heart, and feel that the few will hav to bear the burden until the many can be interested, which I think will surely be the case eventually. I did not know the work you were doing, or your address, until lately in the Progressiv Thinker (to which I am a recent subscriber), and I think it may be the same way with many others who would respond to your call for help were they aware of what you are doing. I will help what little I can from time to time, and will be pleased to hear through the Progressiv Thinker at your convenience how you progress. . . . Next month I will send you another dollar for certificate of membership in your order; and I think Spiritualists and Materialists, above all other classes, should aid you all that is in their power.

From Mr. Crihfield himself, whose five-cent piece (one cent for each member of his family) was the inspiration of the Secular Penny movement, comes the following letter, with twenty cents inclosed:

I hav been pleased to notice that I was the first to respond to your suggestion in regard to establishing a "penny fund" for the benefit of the American Secular Union. It occurred to me as a successful plan of raising money in a small way—a la Peter's pence. In the aggregate it is a wonderful thing. I incline to the opinion that it can be made to work, and as our organization solidifies and enlarges, the pence-plan can be carried to a success by a very little work. To giv further impetus, I inclose a penny each for the following Freethinkers: Geo. Musick, John E. Reed, Morris Reed, A. H. Miller, J. N. Condell, F. N. Cottle, J. B. Saunders, A. L. Reavis, J. F. Sisson, R. A. Talbott, Wm. Beaver, A. Mayfield, John Moos, Aug. Moos.

Hoping to see hundreds of Freethinkers taking an activ interest in the movement, I am,

Yours truly, A. R. CRIHFIELD.

These are but samples of the many kind letters which we are daily receiving, each with its penny or pennies for the Secular Penny Fund; and we take this opportunity to thank writers for their encouragement, as well as for their contributions to the cause. Would that our Liberal friends everywhere would take pattern by these modest and faithful helpers of state Secularization!

To each contributor to the Secular Penny Fund we hav sent one of our circulars as a sort of acknowledgment of their letter and contribution. In one case, however, we hav been unable to do so, as the contributor seems to hav been too modest to let us hav either his name or address. The letter was postmarked Hamburgh, Ia., and contained $2 for the Secular Penny Fund; and we take this opportunity of thanking our unknown contributor for his (or her) generosity.

Now, dear friends, let us hope that those who hav not felt able to contribute anything this year to the American Secular Union work will remember the Secular Penny Fund. "One cent per Liberal!" A small sum, surely, for each one of you to giv to a cause in which every Liberal in the country, whatever his ism, should be practically interested. If you will follow Mr. Crihfield's plan of collecting from your immediate Freethinker friends one cent each to be forwarded to the Secular Penny Fund, with the names of the donors, you will do us a double kindness. (1) The Secular Penny Fund will be the richer for every penny that you collect and forward us; and (2) the names of those contributing can be entered on the list of United States Liberals which we hav been compiling for over a year and a half. Slowly, but surely, Liberalism is evolving into an organized force; and the day is not far distant when we shall want to be able to put our finger on every man and woman in a given town or state who believes in keeping church and state separate, so that we may rally our friends around the uplifted standard of Secularism, and giv successful battle against the ecclesiastical power. So, whenever possible, send us the name of a Freethinker, with a cent from him for the Secular Penny Fund. One penny a year won't break anybody; and the giver will hav the satisfaction of feeling that he is doing his little part in the great and extended work of state Secularization.

Progress of the Cause in Washington.

DEDICATION OF LIBERAL HALL.

Last February I delivered a brief course of lectures at the school-house at McCallum, Kittitas county, the first ever delivered in that neighborhood. After the lectures I organized a local Secular Union of twenty members. G. W. Seaton, of Teanaway, was elected vice-president of the state society for that district.

The local organizstion took the name of the Kittitas Secular Union, and elected as officers: W. M. Carr, president; Mrs. Percilla Friend, secretary; James Masterson, treasurer; J. S. Anthony and J. N. Friend, trustees.

On returning home I wrote out and sent them a suggestiv form of constitution and by-laws, which they had very handsomely printed and a large number judiciously distributed, resulting in many additions to their number.

Having no suitable place of meeting it was decided to build a hall; and although the members were scattered over the two townships of Teanaway and McCallum, yet each and all, with the one desire to promote the greatest good to the greatest number, agreed on a site and succeeded in erecting a very handsome and convenient hall, which on the anniversary of our nation's birthday we dedicated to Universal Mental Liberty.

The hall is situated in the township of Teanaway, in the vicinity of Seaton's Mill. It is quite a handsome building, 24x48, with splendid dancing floor, platform, etc. They own one acre of ground, which it is proposed to beautify as a garden, with croquet ground, etc.

They propose to establish a Liberal and scientific free library, and as they hav had to make quite a severe strain to meet expense of building the hall, they will be especially grateful to any who will help them in the establishing of the library by the donation of books, or the subscribing for Liberal papers for the exclusiv use of the library and reading-room.

They hav regularly incorporated under the laws of the state, issued shares at $1 each, so that all, rich and poor alike, can hav actual interest and ownership in the hall and library.

In response to the urgent request of officers and members, Mrs. Reynolds and myself attended the three days' celebration of the completion and occupancy of the first and only hall built and owned exclusivly by Liberals in the state of Washington.

The lectures were well attended, and on the afternoon of July 4th we dedicated the hall to Universal Mental Liberty.

May the spirit of enterprise, energy, persistence, and self-sacrifice evinced by the officers and members of the Kittitas Secular Union be emulated by every other county in our young giant state, and Washington will indeed become the banner state of Liberalism.

The lectures, the dedication services, the dancing (two nights and quite a good part of one day), the picnic, the picnic dinner (one of the best and most sumptuous I ever attended), everything exceeded expectation. The ball supper was a grand triumph. Everyone present at the celebration had a royal good time. It was a season of holiday and rejoicing long to be remembered.

When each and all put their shoulders to the work and did all in their power, it would seem invidious to mention any, and yet all admit that but for the generous enthusiasm and effectiv work of our worthy vice-president, G. W. Seaton, the building of the hall within five months of the organization of the society would hav been impossible.

RELIGIOUS EXERCISES IN THE PUBLIC SCHOOLS.

Three weeks ago we received a complaint through our vice-president, D. E. Rice, of Roeder, Whatcom county (who is ever activ, zealous, and self-sacrificing in the cause), that in school district No. 19 the teacher wrote the Lord's prayer in doggerel verse upon the black-board, and made all the children sing it each morning before commencing school.

I wrote the teacher, each of the three members of the local school board, and the county superintendent of schools, giving the law, the facts, and the arguments against such acts of injustice.

The teacher wrote me she was violating no law, as she did not call roll till after the singing of the Lord's prayer.

There arose a great excitement in the neighborhood. Christians defied us to stop the religious exercises, and fiercely denounced our vice-president, and the Washington Secular Union, as all of evil and infamy. They got up a petition and remonstrance signed by all the Christian fanatics of the district, urging the teacher to persist in the religious exercises and promising to sustain her in so doing.

The following is a copy of the letter to the teacher sent to her by the county superintendent, G. B. Johnston:

WHATCOM CO., WASH., July 1, 1891.

MISS GERTRUDE MOORE, Nooksack, Wash.—Dear Miss Moore: I am informed that you hav been conducting religious exercises in your school. It becomes my duty under the law to forbid any further continuance of the same either before or after school, though not taking a part of the school time. The law is very plain and I am sorry you hav not been complying therewith.

The same matter has been referred to me from other districts, and my policy is to make our public schools entirely free from any religious instruction. Your life and example before your pupils is worth a great deal more than formal instruction in any doctrins. Very truly yours,

G. B. JOHNSTON, County Superintendent.

Letter from the vice-president of the Washington Secular Union:

July 7, 1891.

FRIEND REYNOLDS: Just learned that your letter brought the county superintendent to the school yesterday. The teacher had been singing the Lord's prayer again. The superintendent told her she was doing very wrong and violating the law, and must stop it. I will be in the school again to-day. Truly yours, D. E. RICE.

The orders of the superintendent hav since been fully obeyed. Another complete victory.

SUNDAY LAWS.

Our pamphlet on "Sunday Laws" was issued in the nick of time; the united Christian organizations are desperately using every means, legitimate and illegitimate, to enforce rigid Sunday observance in all the cities of our state.

I hav mailed about four thousand copies of the "Sunday Laws" pamphlet, mainly in twos and threes and fives, and urged their careful distribution; written a vast number of private letters in regard to the subject, and a number of articles for newspapers throughout the state, most of which hav been published, reaching and influencing those who cannot be induced to read a Liberal paper.

One of the results of thus educating the people on the "facts in regard to Sunday laws" is that it has forced the fanatics to change their base; they now pretend that their war is mainly confined to the saloons; they thus hope to win the sympathy and support of the women and all temperance advocates, ignoring the fact that what is lawful on any one day of the week must be equally lawful on every other day of the week. They stoutly deny that they desire any religious legislation, yet insist the state shall enforce religious observance of the "Lord's day," and close up every place of business or amusement, excepting only livery stables, undertakers', churches, and graveyards.

As a specimen of the kind of opposition we hav to contend with I call especial attention to the sermon delivered in the Presbyterian church last Sunday and published in the Topeka Morning Globe, July 20, 1891.

W. C. Fink, a saloon-keeper of Tacoma, was charged with keeping open his place of business on Sunday, June 7th. At the first trial the jury stood nine for acquittal, at the second trial four for acquittal. The jury having failed to convict, the gospel of peace and love was thus proclaimed from the pulpit of the principal church, and the sermon published in the leading newspaper of the city:

Such men ought not to be allowed to liv in a respectable community. Their mothers ought to disown them, their wives ought to refuse to liv with them, and their children ought to hang their heads in shame; their employers ought to discharge them, their sweethearts ought to discard them, and all good citizens ought to loathe them, and Tacoma ought to spew them out of her mouth.

What heinous crime had these men been guilty of to be thus publicly denounced, held up to public derision and contempt? They had failed to be scared into rendering a verdict at the dictation of the church fanatics. Being summoned on a jury, they had dared to return a verdict according to their best judgment of right and justice, regardless of the wishes of some of the parsons.

Was this fierce invectiv hurled against them because they had erred in judgment? No! it was with the intent to intimidate any who should be called to serve as jurors in similar cases from venturing to render verdict contrary to the wishes of the church.

Yet some people can see no duty nor necessity to sustain the state organization of Liberals.

"With Plus ultra inscribed on our banners, let us press on to these new realms of conquest and this greatest work for our city, our state, and our God."

Oh, no; it is not a religious observance of the day they are fighting for, but simply a civil law to secure for the poor, dear workingmen a needed day of rest.

One case is being carried to the supreme court; if decision is rendered in harmony with the provisions of our state constitution there can be no shadow of doubt of the result.

Until that decision is rendered the fierce onslaught on the liberties of the people and the bitter persecution that will be waged can be judged by the frantic ravings of the pastor of the first Presbyterian church of Tacoma.

C. B. REYNOLDS, Sec. Wash. Sec. Union.
Fremont, Wash.

"A Correct Silver Dollar."

Under the above heading I notice a long article in THE TRUTH SEEKER of July 25th from J. G. Hertwig. A correct silver or gold dollar as relates to the intrinsic value of its material, never yet existed; and in the nature of things never can exist; for about three-fourths of its nominal value is fictitious and necessarily so; for if gold and silver were not in demand for coinage into money they would not bring in the market as products over one-fourth of their present nominal value; so that really as money they are only evidences of debt to the holder, as is a common note of hand, and that is all that money ever was, or ever can be—simply evidence of debt to the holder. It is hard for people to outgrow their infantil prejudices however absurd they may be. And there is hardly any more absurd than the dogmatic humbug of "intrinsic value" in the material of which money should be made. Gold and silver are wholly unfit for money; in the first place, the people hav to be taxed to the amount of a dollar to buy the material, and then pay another dollar with interest on it before they can get it.

The example of the Bank of Venice illustrates the true monetary system, though in that case the principle was somewhat awkwardly applied, which awkwardness can now be corrected. The Bank of Venice gave the people an inflated currency in the form of credits on its books for value received. These credits were a full legal tender for all debts public and private, and would buy anything the people had to sell, though not redeemable in any particular thing. The bank had no use for gold or silver. All payments were made by transfer on the books of the bank, and were simply evidences of debt, as all moneys necessarily must be in the nature of things. This monetary system was continued in successful operation for more than three hundred years, until it was abolished by Napoleon. The system while in operation made the Venetians the most prosperous people in the world.

What a foolish, absurd, and insane idea it is, that gold is necessary by which to "measure" the value of a dollar. If a specific measure is necessary, a day's work of ten hours at shoveling dirt out of a ditch would be a much better measure than so many grains of gold or silver.

The people of the United States, through their government, is the only authority with them for coining money and regulating the value thereof. It can be coined on any material the government may choose and in any amount it may choose; therefore it can never hav any occasion for borrowing money or paying interest. But how can the value of money be regulated? Simply by regulating its volume, and in no other way can it be done. The commercial value of every product in the world, other circumstances being equal, depends on its volume, and money is no exception to this inevitable law.

The United States needs an inflated currency of not less than $75 or $100 per capita to properly transact its business. There is not gold and silver enough for this, and besides none is needed. Paper is far better, vastly better. Our paper money should read about like this: "For value received the people of the United States owe the bearer of this note $1, which is a full legal tender for all debts public and private. Is lawful money of the United States and based on the whole wealth and power of the people of the United States. Signed, ——— ———, controller; ——— ———, treasurer."

Let the government issue from $4,500,000,000 to $6,000,000,000 of this currency, and it will readily adjust itself to the relativ values of everything else. That is what will naturally and appropriately occur under the inevitable law of "other things being equal the price of any commodity depends on its volume."

Then, to prevent panics and hardships in the money market this volume must be kept uniform—never made less, but more as population and increase of trade may require. This, with the entire abolition of interest for the use of money, is what the people of the United States will finally adopt, or remain as they now are, or sink deeper in abject slavery to the aristocracy of wealth.

In this connection I will say a few words about trusts. The nationalization of the industries controled by trusts is the only remedy against them; and the trusts themselvs are preparing the way for their own overthrow. As an illustration take the Standard Oil Company. It has effected great economies in the production and transportation of oil by the adoption of machinery, tram-ways, piping, etc., and thus greatly cheapened its production. It has dispensed with the use of some fourteen hundred teams formerly employed, besides thousands of men in handling. But who has reaped the benefits of these economies? Not the people, but the Standard Oil Company. It has put millions upon millions of dollars into its purse, vastly more than an equitable compensation for services rendered, and at the expense of an ignorant and patient people. But the people, when they get their eyes open, will say to this trust as well as to all others: Gentlemen, you hav legally stolen from us about as much as we can bear; you can keep all you hav got, but this kind of business must be stopped. We now propose to take your franchise into our own hands, allowing you an equitable compensation for your plant, and run it ourselvs in our own interest. We can employ the same agents, at an equitable price, that you hav been employing, or others, as the case may be, but you capitalists who hav been pocketing such fat dividends for these many years at our expense, we cannot see that we hav any further use for you, unless you wish to engage in our service at a reasonable price. We hav been carrying you on our backs until we are very tired, and we now demand a rest.

When the people are ready for it, all these trusts will be finely organized and equipped ready for the people to take into their own hands and run in their own interest. Thus are the trusts themselvs preparing the way for their own overthrow. Let them go ahead, encourage them in it; they are unconsciously and unintentionally educating the people, who will sooner or later absorb all these trusts into one grand trust for their own benefit.

Items of Foreign Freethought News.

A large increase in the number of Freethinkers is reported from Austria, where our friend Eduard Schwella carries the torch of reason.

Six new societies and eight individual members constitute the adhesions for last month to the French Freethought Federation.

Dr. Bruno-Wille, Berlin-Friederichshagen, has taken the position of Dr. Voelkel as editor of Freireligiöses Sonntags-Blatt. We bid him a hearty welcome.

Mlle. Duperret, a lady known alike for her charity and Radical opinions, died lately at Toulon, France. The funeral services were Secular. She left her entire estate, real and personal, to various charitable non-religious institutions.

Rev. Ziegler, of Liegnitz, Germany, is to be suspended from his office in the state church. He has been wicked enough to write a work entitled, "The Historical Christ," in which he shows himself to be a follower of Wellhausen and Kuenen.

Clergymen are naturally monopolists. At the recent conference of Lutheran ministers held in Kirchberg, Saxony, a petition was sent to the government asking that the positions as school inspector should be filled by Lutheran ministers only.

The international Comitè d'Etudes Morales (Committee on Moral Laws), whose president is Mr. Jean Paul Cée, 48 rue Montmartre, Paris, is doing good work. It has its representativs in almost every country, and is continually increasing in membership.

On behalf of American Freethinkers we extend our heartfelt sympathy to J. B. Schaere, president of the French Freethought Federation, on occasion of the recent death of his wife. Mme. Schaere, besides being an activ Freethinker, was a vigorous exponent of woman's rights.

Freiheit relates the following comic occurrence. July 27th, Knights of Labor district 49, of this city, had a picnic, and while marching to the picnic-park carried a banner bearing the following inscription: "Five days for work, one day for our dear Lord, and one day for Humanity."

In China Buddhists murder Christians; in the "Holy Land" Greek and Roman Catholics kill each other; in Russia Greek Catholics prosecute Roman Catholics, Protestants, and Jews; in Germany Protestant sects fight one another and all of them are against the Catholics—and so in almost every country where supernatural religion is believed in, and all this is done for the glory of God and the preservation of the only true faith. True are the words of Shakspere, "What fools these mortals be!"

Victor E. Lennstrand is lecturing throughout Sweden, and the results are as astonishing as favorable. Several new auxiliary societies hav been founded, and there seems to be a race among them all to see which can do the best proselyting work. The Eskilstuna society furnishes one hundred and sixty subscribers to Fritänkaren. We wish our own Freethought societies would as liberally support our own Freethought papers. This spread of Freethought seems to be felt by the churches of Sweden. Congregations from Gefle and Söderhamn are selling lottery tickets for the glory of God and the finishing of their respectiv churches. The annual conference of the Swedish Freethinkers will be held in Stockholm, August 8th and 9th.

THE Freethinkers of Newark, N. J., are organizing a complimentary benefit-meeting for Miss Ada Campbell, the Australian lecturess, who leaves for England the end of this month. The meeting will take place Sunday, August 16th, at 7:30 P.M., at the Liberal League Hall, 177 Halsey street, corner of Market street (the committee having kindly tendered the use of the hall for the occasion). Miss Campbell will deliver a farewell lecture entitled, "Good and Evil, Vice and Virtue, Men and Women." Admission will be by ticket only. Ticket 50 cents.

Communications.

Homeless for a Week.

In THE TRUTH SEEKER for June 13th Mr. A. H. Darrow, of Hartford, Kan., criticises some of the arguments I advanced in favor of the single tax in an article under the above heading. I owe Mr. Darrow an apology for keeping him waiting so long for an answer to his courteous article. The fact is, I hav had my time so fully taken up of late that a "natural opportunity" to write did not present itself. I trust Mr. Darrow will excuse my apparent discourtesy, and will now answer to the best of my ability the objections he finds to the single tax. Referring to what I called Henry Billings's "pitiful pittance of $8 a week," he cites the case of "two strong, healthy young men" who, coming to this country from Switzerland, eventually reached Kansas. They assured Mr. Darrow that all they could earn in their nativ country was "about $1 a week, while here they could earn four or five times as much." I greatly fear these young men hav been gulling Mr. Darrow. I hav not had the pleasure or benefit of a trip to Switzerland and so cannot speak of that country from personal knowledge, but my reading has never led me to believe that "about $1 a week" was considered fair wages for strong and healthy young men. If it is, I fear me that the old and infirm toilers of that country must indeed be hard pushed to make both ends come within sight of each other. Mr. Darrow concludes that as these young men are earning from four to five times as much in America as they did in Switzerland it necessarily follows that labor is four or five times better off in the American republic than it is in the European republic. A cheerful and consoling conclusion truly, but one hardly borne out by the facts. It is admitted, though, that on the whole labor is better paid in this country than it is in the other countries, but that is not the point at issue—that is not the real question. The real question is, Does labor get the full value of its toil? You can no longer satisfy the American laboring men by telling them they are better paid than their fellow-toilers of other countries. Neither does it satisfy them to be told that they are better paid now than ever before. They are not at all sure that their wages are so much better than they used to be, but they are sure they are not getting a fair share of the wealth they produce, while through some devilish chicanery a class of men "who toil not, neither do they spin," are getting pretty much all there is except the comparativly small portion necessary to sustain and silence the laboring men. As I hav said, they are sure of this, their grievance, but they are not so sure as to the remedy. They know they hav been, and are being, struck, and it is but a question of time when they strike back. Whether they will use ballots or bullets I cannot say, but if they will use single-tax ballots bullets will be unnecessary. Mr. Darrow thinks that if the single tax was adopted "those who were able to assert and maintain their rights would get and keep all of the land to the exclusion of others." "Rich landlords could hold their possessions longer than labor could afford to starve." The first of these objections is so pueril it hardly deserves attention. We are living in a land where law is held in esteem and order maintained. If there were any such organized conspiracy to defeat the ends of government the government would undoubtedly crush it as it crushed the Southern Rebellion. When the strong trample on the weak; when might makes right and strength means success, that is Anarchy, that is chaos, and this government is not Anarchistic, nor is it founded on chaos or confusion. No sane man would spend the capital or labor necessary to cultivate a farm, if when he had improved it and was ready to gather his crops any wandering Tom, Dick, or Harry could come up to him and say, "I hav the same right to this farm that you hav; it being as much mine as yours, I propose to hav half it produces." No one would think of opening a mine, erecting a house, or making any improvement intended to be permanent, unless he was reasonably sure he would hav possession of the land on which the improvement was made. Nor is it to be supposed that to acknowledge the equal rights of men in land it is necessary to divide up the land equally. James A. Bailey and his partners hav a very good menagerie, but they do not cut up the animals comprising it in order to giv each partner his share. They think, not without reason, that it would spoil the menagerie if they did. What is necessary is this: Take the value of the land and apply it for the use of the community. Then the land is not the property of owners who can shut out labor from access to it or make labor pay blackmail for the use of it; but then land is free, free and open for labor to do its holy work upon. This is the simple, direct, and sensible way—a tax upon the value of the land according as that value is made or appraised by the community—a tax laid upon the value according to the rental value of that land. Of course titles to the land can be held, and if it givs you pleasure you can call it your own. As long as the community gets the worth of it—that worth which has been created by the community's labor; so long as the community continues to draw its revenues from the land for its own purposes, then the land is for all practical purposes free and open for man to labor upon and to draw forth the things that our bountiful Mother Nature has placed thereon. And does not this clearly show that I am preaching no gospel of laziness, offering no "panacea for shiftlessness," as claimed by Mr. Darrow? Land is not worth a rupee unless labor is applied to it. The late Capt. Mayne Reid tells in his "Queer People" of a tribe of savages who lived on a diet of dirt. But we are discussing civilized people now, not "queer people," and civilized people as a rule cannot liv on dirt (though some, I admit, liv in it). And if the earth is to furnish them with food they must dig and plow and sow and harvest. Men are not intended to be cave-dwellers, and if they are to hav habitations they must first dig foundations and after that form and frame and construct. It is admitted that trees hav not acquired the labor-saving habit of felling themselvs; that iron perversely refuses to do its own smelting; and coal with the unaccountable cussedness sometimes animating inanimate things persistently refuses to come to the surface or break itself into pieces handy for handling. All this being admitted, it follows that these operations are left for the hands of man aided by the forces of nature he has subdued and harnessed for his service. Any "panacea for shiftlessness" in any of those operations? I think not, Mr. Darrow, but I believe there is "a remedy for poverty" in them. "Rich landlords," Mr. Darrow tells us, "could hold their possessions longer than labor could afford to starve." It seems to me that if Mr. Darrow had given the single tax system a little more study than he has he would not raise such a trite and trivial objection to it as the above. Not a great many years ago California was noted for its large ranches. There are a few left yet, notably the Morrow ranch, near San José, which is thirty-five thousand acres in extent, but they will soon be things of the past. Until a very recent period the owners never even dreamed of cultivating them. The taxes were very light—almost nominal in fact—but the payment of them was shirked or dodged. For years they constituted a barrier to the proper development of the state. The majority of them embraced leagues on leagues of land capable of furnishing lucrativ and steady employment to a large population. They should hav been the state's chiefest blessing, instead of which they were its greatest ban. They constituted the field of labor for a few vaqueros and rancheros instead of the teeming population they were capable of supporting. But fortunately for the rest of the state the time came when it became unprofitable to hold them, owing to the natural and unavoidable increase of taxes, and one after another the magnificent domains granted under Mexican rule to the dons of that period hav been disappearing. If it had been possible or profitable for the owners to hold on to them they would hav done so. It is not human nature to let go of a good thing. Let personal property go free and tax land values. No man will then buy or hold more land than he can conveniently handle. The whole, the only aim of the landholder will then be to make what he has produce all it possibly can. As fast as he can make his land into grain, into vegetables and fruits, into sheep and cattle and horses—in a word, into wealth—just that fast will he do it. Rather than permit any of his land to go to tax-sale he will employ three men and horses where he now employs but one. His whole ingenuity, his whole thought, will be given to the getting of the most out of a little ground, instead of being satisfied with a little from a lot of ground. Tax land values, and the millions which are invested in real estate, which in the hands of speculators hamper and dwarf the growth of every settlement from my city to Mr. Darrow's and from Mr. Darrow's to the Pacific slope and the Gulf of Mexico, would be thrust into the channels of trade, and become living, throbbing arteries carrying the rich life-blood of employment and consequent "good times"—that is, prosperity—to every part and portion of the body politic. The man who has a lot of unproductiv real property will either let it go to tax-sale or else he will build on it or cultivate it. Of one thing you may be sure, he won't hold it in an attempt to "starve labor." Mr. Darrow seems to hold the general opinion that men do not need land, but only the results of labor. This puts me in mind of McKeever's hog. That intelligent animal "didn't care a damn for oak trees since all it wanted was acorns." Tell me, my dear Mr. Darrow, how are men to get the results of labor without land? Bare land of no value to Henry Billings. No, not in the sense in which you take it, although you will probably admit that it is a most convenient thing to be upon, more convenient, for instance, than being in the water or up in the air. But how about bare land allied with bare labor? A strong combination that, don't you think? Separate them, and one is unproductiv, almost useless, while the other steals, or, as in the case of Henry Billings, begs or starves. But break down the parchment barriers that separate them and let them freely unite, and prosperity is the natural, the inevitable result. It has been said so often it has become trite, that man is a land animal; without access to land he cannot exist any more than a fish can exist without access to water. It is invisible, but nevertheless there is a chain on every human being tying them to the surface of the earth. Whether man goes out upon the wide and treacherous sea, or delves into the bowels of the earth, or emulating in his own weak and feeble way the eagle's flight he ascends into the air, that invisible chain holds him fast to the earth's surface. To break that chain means death. Whoever, then, lays claim to an exclusiv ownership of a part of the earth's surface that another man must use is the owner of that man and is the owner of him to the extent of life and death. If all-wise nature had not intended man to liv, why did she create him? Look, then, at these two facts. Man is born; looking about him he sees more than ample means with which by the mere application of his labor he can supply all his wants, material and moral. Is he hungry, does he thirst, is he oppressed by heat or chilled with cold; on every hand is material to supply his every need. And having attended to his more pressing wants, his more material necessities, is he desirous of satisfying other wants, of progressing mentally and morally? Nature with lavish, almost wasteful hands has strewed broadcast the required materials. All that is left for him to do is to apply his skill and strength to the land, to the forces and opportunities with which he is surrounded. His progress is only limited by his knowledge as to how to use his skill and labor, and his willingness to use them. Without these natural materials what could man's labor produce? Where in all this "wide, wide world" is there one thing made by human toil that has not been produced, primarily, from the land? There is not one. Where a single occupation which has not its foundation upon the land? The land is the material, the fabric; man is the workman. Without land man cannot work, without work he must of necessity starve. These facts are self-evident. If then you require man to beg or buy land, you compel him to beg or buy the privilege of working—that is to say, of living. This makes him a slave just as much as though he was sold on the auction-block to the highest bidder. It makes no particle of difference what he calls himself or is called, no matter how apparently exalted his condition in life, he is a slave. He may hav the proud privilege of the ballot, may hold a high and honorable office, may believe in any religion he pleases, or, like Mr. Darrow and myself, believe in none; but so long as he must beg or buy the right of applying his labor to land, just so long is he a slave, and the whole world his master. This infamous monopolization of the gifts of nature is why capital can drive such hard bargains with labor. Suppose Labor, stung at last by his wrongs, refuses to submit, and says to Capital, "You hav driven me beyond the point of endurance; I'll submit no longer to be ground into the very dust for your aggrandizement." Capital, knowing his power, replies, "All right, my man, go elsewhere." And so poor, foolish, misguided manly Labor starts out, stout of heart and lean of purse, to look for work. Does he find it? I will tell you what he finds. He finds he is living in a civilized (?) country more than capable of feeding a dozen times its present population, and he finds at least two-thirds of its land untilled, or but partially cultivated. He finds that, at the most conservativ estimate, at least eight-tenths of the coal-beds and quarry-lands and mineral deposits are unused, untouched, just as they came fresh from the hands of nature. And looking around him he finds vacant land, unused land, waste land on every side. All this he has found, but he has not found a job yet. And so, a little bit discouraged, he makes his weary way to the metropolis, and he finds within the corporate limits more than half the area of that great city vacant, unoccupied. All this, bear in mind, in spite of the fact that there are miles upon miles of sky-scraping and morality-destroying tenement houses in which men and women, aye, and little children are packed and pressed like sardines. And yet there are loads of room in that great city for the comfortable and decent housing of every man, woman, and child in it. But Labor has not succeeded in finding the job he was looking for. Suppose he goes to one of these pieces of vacant land, one of these "natural opportunities," and begins the novel experience of being his own employer. Along comes Landlord, waving a title-deed at him, and orders him off under the pains and penalties of the law. Poor, misguided, deluded Labor. His eyes are opened at last, and he sees that all these unused natural opportunities are owned by individuals and held as private property. He learns at last that he cannot go to work anywhere unless he first pays a tribute to a blackmailer who owns a natural opportunity, and so, crushed in spirit, with the last smoldering spark of manhood extinguished, he goes back to Capital and, making a low obeisance, he says, "Sir, in mercy's name grant me the boon of making a living, and I will be your willing serf for the rest of my wretched life." No "insubordination" there, is there, Mr. Darrow? And Capital, still aware of his power, drives a bargain compared with which the one that stung labor into desperation and despair was mild and meek and merciful, and Labor, helpless as Andromeda chained to the rocks, submits. There is still another point. As population increases, as it grows in numbers, these natural opportunities increase in value, and in the same ratio of increase goes up also the amount of the tribute in money labor will hav to pay for access to them, for the privilege of living. The more of the products of toil which is used for the payment of this constantly increasing tribute to the land-minotaur, the less will be the share or portion allowed to the laborer. As a consequence, the harder will become his already too hard lot.

"In Kansas," says Mr. Darrow, "we need flax and linen factories more than we need the single tax." He seems to think that the broad state of Kansas is not large enough to hold both. If Kansas had the single tax, it would not be very long before it had linen and flax factories, and dozens of other industries. Suppose Businessman desires to invest $25 000 in flax or linen industry. Going out to Hartford he finds an excellent site for his factory. It is a block of land that has not been touched since the Sacs, or Sioux, or whatever tribe of aborigines peopled that part of Kansas, roamed the land. But I mistake. It has been touched with a title-deed, and the owner of that title-deed immediately "touches" Businessman for $8,000. That is the price Businessman must giv for the privilege of giving employment to labor, for setting the wheels of industry in motion on that plot of land. "Well, but," says Businessman, "I hav but $25,000 capital, every penny of which I will need to erect my factory, put in engins and machinery, carry stock, etc. If you take away one-third of my available capital you will prevent me from carrying out my design." To this the landholder replies, that if Businessman does not giv it he will get it from some one else, even if he has to wait till the city grows a little larger. And so Businessman turns away balked and baffled; the factory is not erected, and the labor is not employed. This is not a fancy sketch. It is the same everywhere. Wherever there is a plot of ground not too far from communication with the outside world, that is to say, an available natural opportunity, there is a human dog-in-the-manger, and that Cerberus must hav a sop thrown to him in the shape of rent before industry can pass him. Is it a matter for surprise that hundreds of thousands of workers of both sexes want work and cannot find it? Is it surprising that the poor are constantly getting poorer; that we complain of there being too much cotton grown, although hundreds of thousands are insufficiently clothed; that carpenters' tools are getting rusty for the want of use, notwithstanding a majority of the people are not properly housed. How can it be other than it is so long as labor, the creator of all wealth, is compelled to beg, hat in hand, for the privilege of employment. Pick up a newspaper, any one will do. You are almost certain to read the account, dismissed with a paragraph, of some poor devil, being out of work and despondent, finally ending his wretched, wasted life by his own hand. It has got so that thousands care less than nothing whether they liv or die. Ask the average mechanic Mallock's famous query and in a majority of cases it will be answered in the negativ. Yesterday a man named Aroon Carpenter committed suicide by taking paris green. He was not looking for fame or notoriety. He was not trying to touch the tender sympathies of a gullible public; but he was looking for escape from starvation. Think of it! Here in the commercial metropolis of the most prosperous country on the face of the earth, where powers of production are developed to the highest point of perfection, this man, anxious to produce and capable of producing, is forbidden to satisfy his needs by putting his powers to use, until, at last, in the insanity of despair, he rushes to a self-created death. Why didn't he go to a charity association, you ask? It was not alms he wanted, it was justice. He wanted the right of making a living, not permission to beg one. That right was conferred upon him by nature in common with every other human being. It was conferred upon him in power to work, and limitless opportunities for work, but society had robbed him of it. He was the master of one factor of producing wealth, that is, labor and yet he was made utterly dependent for the other, the soil, on the greed and cupidity of his fellow-men. And in this Christian age fate help the man who is dependent on his fellow-man. And yet there is nothing novel or out of the ordinary in Aroon Carpenter's case. It is only one of thousands. And in the same city are other thousands of men who toil not nor hav occasion to toil, because, owing to our unjust social system, they are enabled to liv upon the price of the natural opportunities for work of which Aroon Carpenter was deprived. Surely the laborer should be allowed to labor, and surely "the laborer is worthy of his hire," and surely it is a crime to deprive him of either. And when I speak of depriving the laborer of his hire, I don't mean merely depriving him of the hire he has been compelled to agree beforehand to accept, because, perchance, he was famishing; because he was naked, without a habitation he could call his own; because of his crying need for anything that would be enough to help him for a little while to keep body and soul together; that is not the hire of the laborer, what his wretchedness and want hav compelled him to agree to take. His hire is what he should hav been able to demand—the full wages of his industry, that is, what justice and equity in every case requires shall be awarded him. If he has agreed beforehand to receive less than he is entitled to, the other party to the agreement is taking a mean and criminal advantage of his ignorance or indigence. These two crimes are committing in our shops and stores, in our foundries and fields, in our mines and marble quarries, in every place where labor is employed. But it cannot always last.

> The mills of the gods grind slowly,
> But they grind exceeding small.

Injustice may triumph for a while. Wrong may flourish and tyranny thrive, but it will not be forever. Only the right is eternal, only the truth is immortal. I may not see the dawning of the better day. The glories of the golden age may be denied to me, but I feel, I know, that the time will surely come

> When the right will be uppermost,
> And justice shall be done.

That "Correct Silver Dollar."

Mr. J. G. Hertwig's "Correct Silver Dollar" in THE TRUTH SEEKER of July 25th appears to be of the same character the gold-owners and creditor class cause to be inserted in the daily and religious press of the country. It seems that the suggestion of R. B. Hayes while president has just taken root and possession of the mind of Mr. Hertwig. A correct silver dollar controled by the price of the metal in the market, indeed! and used as a basis for the issuance of silver certificates to be used as money! and the president to annually determin its value! and upon certificates accordingly—thus, if the president finds it depreciated one-half, he will put two dollars' worth of the metal into one dollar, if it goes to one hundred per cent premium he would coin fifty cents' worth into a dollar, and so on. Such doctrin may be very good for Mr. Hertwig, his interest may lie in the direction of despoiling the sense of the people as well as their pockets, and it may be accepted as good philosophy by Hayes, Cleveland, and the present incumbent, but it will hardly do for the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Looking a little ahead, judging from the condition of affairs that surrounds us, it will become apparent to the thoughtful that neither gold, silver, nor both combined can supply the demand of money nor furnish the basis for it. To furnish a basis for currency is worse than folly, it is idiocy.

It requires the accumulation of two volumes of money—one to use, the other being in Mr. Tilden's reservoir. To secure just one currency and a sufficiency will be attended with many difficulties, disappointments, heartsickness.

In case this double standard be provided it will always be in danger of loss from capture by invasion or rebellion, or by the simple turning of the bolts by the custodian, as in the case of many of the states, and thereby leave all of Uncle Sam's nephews and nieces in the condition of THE TRUTH SEEKER family—without a redeemer. Such was, doubtless, the intention of the framers of the metal basis reservoir clause.

Would it not be terrible to look forward throughout a long life in the full faith and hope of a redeemer, and all the time "knowing that my [our] redeemer liveth," to find in the end the whole thing to be a damned fraud? The people of this country probably need four or five billion dollars of money currency. This, or whatever amount they do need, much or little, the government should procure at the lowest possible cost in material, and issue it as full legal tender for all debts public and private.

By free coinage the currency comes to the people without cost for intrinsic value save to the owner who supplies it and who is paid upon parting with it. To the people it becomes expensiv by reason of wear and abrasion, and is loss when required to be supplied, as is the case with any other kinds of currency when required to be destroyed and reissued.

This silver money, stricken down in 1873 by the act of demonetization, operated as more than an entire loss to the people—both intrinsically and as money. The English money managers procured the passage of that act by purchase (see their Magazine, 1873). They would induce the United States to crowd four dollars' worth of metal into one dollar of coin and buy it, and sell it for ten prices to their dupes if they could. In like manner they would employ Mr. Hertwig to muddle the minds of his people and despoil them. Most nations use silver as money; we should endeavor to supply them, and in doing so, supply ourselvs. J. W. JAMES.

Cash!

Will you please allow me the privilege through the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER to ask Mr. J. G. Hertwig, of Washington, D. C., the following questions:

1. What is money?
2. Is money a creation of law?
3. Is it money outside of the limits of the government that created it?
4. Did any nation ever use the money of other nations as a lawful money?
5. If metal money is not money outside of the country that makes it, what is it?
6. Does the rule apply to all countries?
7. Is there any such thing as a money of the world?
8. Is gold, silver, copper, or any other matter money before the law makes it money?
9. If all countries were to abolish the law making metal money and substitute some other matter, without changing the quantity, what effect would it hav on the business of the country?
10. What is meant by intrinsic value?
11. Hav gold and silver a greater intrinsic value than other metals?
12. What reasons are there for using gold and silver for money?
13. If metal money is necessary, why not some other metal just as well?
14. What is the value of a gold or silver dollar?
15. In buying a horse or other property, using gold or silver coin, what does the selling party get for his property?
16. Is the value of gold, silver, and copper coins established by law?
17. Does the law ever change those values?
18. Has not the value of gold changed more than any other metal?
19. If the silver dollar, 412½ grains, has taken its former place as money, why is it called the 79-cent dollar?
20. Why were all the smaller silver coins made seven per cent light?
21. Why were they deprived of their legal tender quality for all sums over $5?
22. What is the relativ effect in trade upon the rich and the poor by the use of these light-weight coins which are not a full legal tender?
23. What effect will the drain of gold from one country to another hav upon the productiv interests of those countries?
24. Where do governments derive their power to coin money and set thereon a value?

Now, friend Hertwig, as soon as you answer these questions we will furnish you another batch.

Things an Editor Lacks.

B. R. Tucker, Pooh Bah of Anarchy, in Liberty.

The Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, who finds in Ingersoll that perfection which he fails to find in the Christian's Jesus, is as pained and angered by rational criticism of his idol as the pious Christian is by any attempt to apply to Jesus the test of common sense. The sharp comments called forth by Ingersoll's eloquent cant in defense of things as they are naturally move our good Ingersollian disciple to attack the Infidel critics in the true old Christian fashion. He says that it is mild language to call their statements lies; that the Socialists and Anarchists object to the common sense which Ingersoll applies to the labor question and wag malicious tongues at a man too big for them to comprehend; that only "little people, so short-sighted that they cannot see their own limitations, jump around him and call him 'shallow,'" and that "there is small hope of getting the envious and dishonest social critics of Colonel Ingersoll to do him justice." To refute the critics' statements the editorial apologist reprints certain very familiar Ingersollian utterances, mostly platitudinous, vague, and contradictory. Now, I cannot undertake to enlighten the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, having no confidence whatever in his capacity or receptivness. I can only repeat that I know Ingersoll to be utterly incompetent to discuss scientific economics, politics, or ethics. When he loses himself in the mazes of shallow talk I am not surprised. If Ingersoll's nonsense appears to the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER sterling and profound sense, the inevitable inference is that he is even more ignorant than Ingersoll is. And to show what a pitch of stupidity he can attain I only need to refer to his characterization of the editor of Liberty as a "self-elected spokesman of 'philosophical Anarchy' and self-appointed corrector of the human race." Who elected Macdonald spokesman of Freethought (limited) and corrector of the human race? Or is it proper to be a theological corrector of the human race and improper to be a political and social corrector of the human race?

OWING to illness in Mr. Heston's family THE TRUTH SEEKER appears this week without pictures. We shall hav them in the succeeding issue. Mr. Heston knows that he and his invalid wife hav the sympathy of his friends, and his friends will be glad to know that the illness will probably be only temporary.

WE shall print next week an article by John E. Remsburg, asking "When Did Jehoshaphat Die?" It is revised and rewritten from one with the same title published in the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL a few years since. Through a seemingly trivial question Mr. Remsburg strikes one of his hardest blows, not only against those who defend the dogma of plenary inspiration, but against those so-called Rationalists in theology who are disposed to accept the alleged historical books of the Bible as reliable history. The dispute between the "higher" and "lower" (or traditional) critics, brought about by the Briggs case, has again forced the matter to the front. Mr. Remsburg is always forcible and critical, and this article will be of great service to Freethought.

Deceptions of History.

History has been defined as a collection of "lies agreed upon." But a considerable portion of this form of literature consists of lies still in dispute. Nor is the reader entirely safe when there is no disagreement as to the essential facts; for the facts may be so arranged, and the narrativ so artfully colored, as to produce a wrong result and inculcate a false lesson. Events can be so ingeniously shuffled as to turn up a lying collocation. No works need to be read with more care and discrimination than so-called histories. No author can be taken as absolute authority for all the assertions that embellish his pages. Bnt this is not the only difficulty; if the reader is not on his guard he will thoughtlessly giv his assent to a historian's erroneous reasoning on the facts stated. It would be easy to point out instances of entire misapprehension as to the truth of history under which the mass of readers are laboring to this day.

It is necessary to look beneath the surface of the events paraded with so much effect on the ordinary historical page, to discern the spirit of the age, and grasp an adequate conception of the invisible movement of social or religious forces. The indications of such movements are not usually to be found in the policy of courts or cabinets; nor are they revealed always in the tramp of armies, or in the accounts of sieges, battles, and conquests. A history of France, ending with the year 1788, would hav contained no hint of the activity of the forces which were so soon to precipitate the cataclysm that whirled king, nobles, and priests into a common ruin. As soon as one is enabled to discover the intellectual drift of an age or a people, he can fairly interpret the events on the surface of affairs, and he is fortified against the arts by which a historian attempts to mystify or mislead the reader.

To go back no more than two hundred years, there is an incident in English history that may serve as an excellent illustration of the folly of accepting without question the conclusions of even the most distinguished and popular historian. In 1688, James II., a Catholic king, was on the throne of England. At that time there were statutes in force which enabled the Established church to persecute the Catholics and the Protestant Dissenters. But James, with the ulterior purpose, no doubt, of building up the Catholic church, published a declaration in which he suspended the execution of the persecuting statutes. He ordered this declaration to be read, on a certain Sunday, in all the churches. The bishops of the Church of England came together, drew up a protest against this order, and seven of them went in person and presented this protest to the king. He had them arrested and imprisoned in the tower, and instituted in the ordinary courts of law a prosecution against them for libel, of which charge they were ultimately acquitted.

Now, Macaulay, in his history, has, in these proceedings, no word of condemnation for anyone but the king. His declaration was illegal and his object was sinister. Whether the first of these accusations is true is a matter in dispute to this day. But previous kings had set aside the execution of statutes, without provoking opposition. As to the second, whatever the king's motiv might hav been his measure was salutary and unobjectionable. Who will now deny that religious toleration was a good thing?

On the other hand, Macaulay holds up the bishops to the gratitude of Britons and the admiration of mankind, as though they had, at great personal peril, stood for the liberties of England. But the facts plainly show—the undisputed facts—that they only won a crown of infamy. Their action stands out in all its naked baseness. They had recently revived, with great earnestness, the odious doctrin of divine right and passiv obedience. Whatever was ordained by the "Lord's anointed" must be submitted to with patient obedience and without a murmur. But the moment the king proposed that other sects might enjoy freedom equal to their own, they flew to arms, and repudiated their pet doctrin in favor of the royal prerogativ. Their claim that the indulgence granted by the king was illegal can be no defense for them. When other kings had used the prerogativ for purposes of injustice and cruelty they had given not so much as a whisper of protest; but they turned their backs on their own repeated professions when this king used his prerogativ in favor of a singularly just and beneficent measure—when he had, for the first time in English history, given to the country an edict of religious toleration. The fact seems to be that the prelates of the Church of England were thrown into a paroxysm of rage because they were to be deprived of the cherished joy of persecuting their religious foes. It was not the first time nor the last when the church has sacrificed its professed principles to its interest and its revenge.

Macaulay also commends the Dissenters, because at this juncture they made common cause with the English church in resisting the king. The church had always delighted to persecute them. Only a few years before, these very statutes which the king suspended had been let loose against them in the most cruel manner, and some of their distinguished leaders were still smarting from the blows they had received. Why should they not make the most of their opportunity now? The principle of toleration had been put before the people; they might hav assisted to establish it, whatever became of the king. Had they taken their stand on toleration, they might hav hastened their own emancipation from the rigors of persecution. But, blinded by bigotry, they joined hands with those who had despoiled them and rejected the toleration offered them, for no conceivable reason except that they would not share it with Catholics. It is hard to say which awakens the most indignation or contempt—the cruelty of the church attempting to stamp out toleration, or the folly of the Dissenters in kissing the hand that smote them?

As to this passage of history, it is probable that thousands hav been misled by Macaulay's discoloration. But it only shows how careful we must be not to be deceived by a historian's reasoning, even when we do not dispute his facts. What his motiv was in thus attempting to turn from the church the condemnation it deserved we may not know. In previous publications he had not been too tender of its fame. But it is to be hoped that readers will not always be misled in matters of history, even by the charm of his style, the splendor of his diction, or the brilliancy of his rhetoric.

The Case of Mr. Swartz.

We had not thought to say anything in reply to Mr. C. L. Swartz's exculpation of his own conduct in selling copies of a paper filled with slanderous and libelous matter, but a description of the journal in question published in the last number of the Twentieth Century so strongly emphasizes what we previously said, and, if true, makes Mr. Swartz's offense so detestably heinous (though we do not accuse him of intentionally offending), that it may be well to once more refer to the case.

Mr. Swartz said to us:

"Like most others who attempt to justify the interference of legalized authority with what can be but the affair of the individual, you confound the right to sell whatever some one else wants to buy, and consequently the right to publish and disseminate whatever a person chooses, with the palpable abuse of such freedom by a libel. No one can more detest libel or slander, or be more willing to make reparation for such, unintentionally published, than myself.

"This case is similar to those of Lucifer and the Word. In neither of these has any injured party appeared against the defendant; but Heywood is in the Massachusetts state prison with a two years' sentence half served, and Harman has six years of the same punishment hanging over his head. Nor has my offense been greater—or less. Bennett, Harman, and Heywood libeled no one, and they were imprisoned; I hav circulated naught but the truth—does the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER think I should be imprisoned?"

The description of the paper sold by Mr. Swartz, signed "Senator, Rockport, Mo.," is as follows:

"The clipping from the Voice [relating to the Missouri Legislature] started with the Kansas City ——, a sheet so low, filthy, and vile that the Missouri legislature, early in its last session, passed an act entitled 'Immoral Publications,' aimed largely at the ——, making it a felony for any person to hav in his possession for sale, or keep for sale, or expose for sale, or distribute, or in any way assist in the sale, or gratuitously distribute or giv away any such newspaper, etc., etc., etc. Punishment, imprisonment in the penitentiary for a term of not less than two nor more than five years. That foul and cowardly sheet, to get even with the legislature, waited till its adjournment and then published a series of filthy articles charging the members who were the most activ in the passing of the bill with the most indecent conduct, giving their names, and indiscriminately naming those who were at the state capital at the time and those who were hundreds of miles away. The sheet is wholly indecent and irresponsible, and the law is being enforced against it all over the state. Whoever sells it does so under the cover of secrecy. It is read only by gamblers, sluggers, thugs, thieves, and bawds."

Mr. Swartz alleges that he "circulated naught but the truth." What does he think of that assertion now? And did he take pains to find out if the stuff in the paper he sold was true? Of course not. And in circulating the sheet, thereby injuring others, he violated the principles of individualism which he professes to hold dear. Had he known of his own knowledge that the libels in the paper were true his act would still be contemptible; not knowing it, it was worse.

Mr. Swartz further said that because no one person has commenced an action against him for personal injury he has done no wrong. If this is good logic then he has a right to commit a nuisance once a week against the public, for he can triumphantly point to the fact that no particular individual is injured thereby.

No matter how big a blunder the state's attorney may hav made in drawing up the complaint or the indictment, or how informal the wording of the law as enacted, the fact remains patent to the most dull comprehension that the intent of the legislature was "to protect the libeled from the libeler." That language has been employed that does not express this as clearly as it should is a mere technicality.

We learn that the paper only prints names in full when it attacks the weak and defenseless. When it slanders a person who is able and likely to prove willing to follow the case through a course of law it prints the name incorrectly or otherwise locates its victim so that the public will know whom it means and it yet escape legal responsibility. The only way to reach these vile sheets is to wipe them out by such an enactment as the Kansas law was evidently intended to be. If the law does not fill the bill it should be remodeled.

It is certain that it is only the state which can protect people from such vile sheets, for without the state there could be no libel law, and punishment for invasion of personal rights would be accomplished personally and by violence. Personal liberty is the dearest thing in the world, but one man's liberty must be curtailed when he uses it to injure another. These carrion crows are enemies to social liberty and freedom—what Mr. Swartz is contending for—and enemies to personal rights. In helping them Mr. Swartz was the invader, not the defender, of liberty. The private lives of individuals do not concern the public unless before the public legally. We do not believe that Mr. Swartz himself will defend the acts of his employers, and there is certainly no parallel at all between his case and the cases of D. M. Bennett, Moses Harman, and E. H. Heywood. They injured no one; Mr. Swartz did.

The Two Schools of Critics.

The war between the "Higher" and the "Lower" critics goes merrily on, and before the struggle closes the Old Testament at least will be pretty well torn in pieces. The Independent, with much unwisdom (from the Christian standpoint), is printing generous essays on the subject and enlightening more Christians than ever the books of Kuenen and his fellow "higher" critics could reach. Its latest work of enterprise is to print a pro and con consideration of the matter by Professors Curtiss and Osgood, in which the former givs his conclusions as to what the critics hav shown, and the latter states why he rejects their work altogether. The latter uses Dr. Kuenen's "Hexateuch"—the Pentateuch and Joshua—as a text, considering him the leader of the critical heretics. The facts which he collocates from Kuenen as being firmly established by the higher criticism will be of the greatest interest to the studious inquirer into Old Testament accuracy. He quotes:

"The character of the legislation as a whole is in absolute contradiction with the setting in which the Hexateuch puts it" (Hexateuch, p. 19). "The representation of Moses as a law giver, given in the Hexateuch itself, is, therefore, contradicted rather than confirmed by the form of the legislation. With respect to the tradition which makes him the actual writer of the whole Tora [Pentateuch] we must express ourselvs much more strongly. It is absolutely excluded by the difference of form between the several codes" (p. 23).

"There can be no question, therefore, that if we place ourselvs at the point of view of the Hexateuch itself we are justified in regarding the ordinances of Exodus to Deuteronomy as the several parts of a single body of legislation, and comparing them one with another as such. The comparison will often reveal important differences, nay, irreconcilable contradictions" (p. 24).

"The evidence furnished by the conflicting character of the narrativs of the Hexateuch and their differences of form is confirmed by their contents." "Their representations, to put it in a word, are utterly unhistorical, and, therefore, cannot hav been committed to writing until centuries after Moses and Joshua" (p. 42).

"The representations in the later books of the Hexateuch simply defy the conditions of space and time to which every event is subject; and by which, therefore, every narrativ may be tested. The exodus, the wandering, the passage of the Jordan, and the settlement in Canaan, as they are described in the Hexateuch, simply could not hav happened" (p. 43).

"Is it not obvious that the narrators had never once thought of all this and regarded it as the simplest matter in the world to accomplish things which, in point of fact, are absolutely impossible within the limits of space and time which they themselvs assign?"

"It is not too much to say that the representation of all this given in the Hexateuch is absurd" (p. 46).

"The representations of the Hexateuch, as they stand, can only be regarded as the products of ages long after Moses and Joshua when the true course of events was almost forgotten, and genuin historical reminiscences could only be preserved by having a place assigned them in a fictitious framework" (p. 48. Italics mine).

Numbers is a "fictitious narrativ" (page 94).

"The representation of the Mosaic times and of the settlement in Canaan which the Hexateuch givs us is, as a whole, contradicted by the veritable history" (page 192).

Deuteronomy is a "literary fiction" (page 219).

"The clear indications of diversity of authorship furnished by these conflicting representations would lead us a priori to expect linguistic evidence of a corresponding nature. Nor is our expectation deceived; each of the divergent accounts has its distinctiv language and characteristic turns of speech and style" (page 4).

Moses.—Dr. Toy, agreeing with Dr. Kuenen (Hexateuch, page 244), says:

"If he (Moses) wrote any commandments the record has been lost." "If we cannot suppose that the Pentateuch is correct history, then we do not know precisely what Moses did for his people" (Rel. of Israel, page 25).

"The Israelites were hardly civilized before the time of Samuel and David [i.e. 1000 B.C.], and not ready to write books for a century or two later." "The Israelites were not accustomed to writing in those early days" (pages 52, 53).

"We proceed to pass judgment upon the doctrin of the prophets regarding Yahveh's rewards and punishments. While paying homage to the earnestness of the prophets' conception of the righteousness of Yahveh, we must positivly deny its truth" (Prophets, page 354).

"The representations of the prophets and prophecy in the narrativs of the Old Testament is not historical" (page 404).

"The priestly and prophetic historians agree in this, that history is for them a means, not an end; and that they thus hav no scruple in allowing their own convictions and wishes to exercise an influence on their representations of the past" (page 436).

"Its [New Testament's] judgment concerning the origin and nature of the prophetical expectations, and concerning their relation to the historical reality, may be regarded as diametrically opposed to ours" (page 448).

"When we compare Christianity as it presents itself to us in the founder and in the first preacher of his gospel, with the predictions of the Old Testament, it becomes at once evident that they do not agree fully and literally. There is no similarity and conformity between prophecy and issue" (page 499).

"We must either cast aside as worthless our dearly bought scientific method, or must forever cease to acknowledge the authority of the New Testament in the domain of the exegesis of the Old. Without hesitation we choose the latter" (page 487).

"The New Testament Christ is another than the messiah of the Old Testament" (page 510).

"In the estimation of his contemporaries and earliest disciples Jesus was a prophet, preëminently the prophet" (page 515).

"They (i.e., Jesus and the New Testament writers) found in scripture what it did not contain, or what at most existed there in germ" (page 544).

Professor Curtiss, in his summing up of what the higher criticism affirms concerning the Pentateuch, says:

"The present consensus of criticism regarding the Pentateuch, or, rather, Hexateuch, including Joshua, is substantially as follows: The work is made up of at least four different documents, two of which are clearly marked in Genesis by the use of the divine names, but especially by differences in style and mode of religious representation. The critics affirm that the style of the Jehovist, as he is called, can be clearly distinguished from that of the writer in the Priest's Code, who has a predilection for numbers and for repetition, such as 'the fruit-tree bearing fruit after its kind,' 'beast of the earth after its kind,' etc.

"There is one book of the Pentateuch (Deuteronomy) where the priests are designated as Levitical, but never as the sons of Aaron. In the same book Jerusalem is specified as the place where God should be worshiped, as the critics claim, in opposition to the custom of worshiping him on the high places.

"The critics who belong to the school of Wellhausen claim that the oldest combined document was the Jehovistic, which was a fusion of the works of the Jehovist and second Elohist, the second the Deuteronomic, the third the Code of Holiness in Leviticus, and the fourth the Priest's Code. They show how, in the time, place, mode of worship, and in the priesthood, we hav development.

"While there is much diversity among the critics as to the age and the succession of the documents, there is substantial accord among them as to the analysis of them.

"All are agreed, too, that the Old Testament history, so far as we can follow it, except in those parts of Joshua which are claimed to emanate from the priestly writer, and in Chronicles, which is written entirely from his standpoint, affords no evidence of the existence of the Pentateuch as a whole before the time of the exile.

"The Pentateuch, except Genesis, is regarded as made up of several codes of laws. The incidents in connection with these codes are designed to giv the concrete examples of the application of these laws.

"The critics argue that the old Mosaic laws were revised according to the existing needs of later times, and that the Israelitish law-book, like all other law-books, was a growth."

Some of the conclusions regarding others of the remaining books of the Old Testament set forth by Professor Curtiss are that the Psalms are not by David and that Job never wrote the book bearing his name. "The consensus of criticism," he says, "is that Job is as truly fictitious as the parable of the Prophet Nathan about the ewe lamb (2 Sam. xii, 1–6), and of Christ about the rich man and Lazarus (Luke xvi, 20–31)." Solomon's Song, too, "is in the same connection. The traditional view of this is that it is an allegory." The authorship of Ecclesiastes is also taken from Solomon. Chronicles is of course made anonymous, and the book of Daniel a production of only a century or two before Christ. As a result of this discussion Professor Curtiss finds the Old Testament history far from trustworthy. He says: "The Old Testament, in the view of the critics, cannot be considered infallible, nor can the traditions regarding its authorship and the time when different books were composed be considered trustworthy when in conflict with other evidence. Neither the testimony of the Talmud, nor even of the New Testament, is regarded as final in this matter. Such a conclusion is very disappointing. It is naturally our desire to feel that the form of revelation is absolutely perfect, that the ultimate science and history of the Bible will be found to be exact, and that each prediction down to the minutest details will hav an exact fulfillment. This is naturally our theory regarding scripture; but here as everywhere else it is a question of fact. After starting with the presupposition of the supernatural and the miraculous, we cannot adopt canons of criticism in the interpretation of scripture which would be considered as evasions, subterfuges and apologies in the treatment of any other book."

Professor Osgood's reply to these statements is that of the small boy—"You're another." He says their method is unscientific, because "In the Bible God is asserted to be the principal narrator. Egyptology and Assyriology hav risen up from the dust and the dead to show to us that the facts would not hav been out of time or place as they are narrated. The wonderful effects recorded in the Bible are by it assigned to a competent, sufficient cause, to God himself. It cannot be denied that omnipotence could work such miracles, if it saw fit." But as this is a resort to mere faith it throws no light upon the subject and certainly does not invalidate a single statement made by the higher critics. It is not for them to prove that God could not do these things, but for those who assert them to prove (1) that there is a God; and (2) that he did do them. Until the lower critics grapple these questions squarely they are not in court. But, as we said, when the two schools of critics get through with each other the Bible will be considerably smaller than at present.

The Decision in Mr. King's Case.

Judge E. S. Hammond, district United States judge sitting at Memphis, Tenn., has handed down his decision in the case of R. M. King, the Seventh Day Adventist, who was convicted a year ago of Sabbath-breaking by plowing on Sunday in Obion county. Mr. King appealed to the supreme court, and the sentence was affirmed. Then the Adventists and National Religious Liberty Association took up the case. Don M. Dickinson was engaged as counsel, and the case was taken to the federal court last November on a writ of habeas corpus, the contention being that the conviction was contrary to the bill of rights of Tennessee and the Constitution of the United States, and that the defendant was held prisoner by the sheriff without due process of law. The application was argued several months ago, and Judge Hammond has had it under advisement ever since. The defendant is remanded back to the custody of the sheriff to pay the fine or serve the time in lieu, according to the sentence.

Only the merest outline of the opinion has reached the public, but it appears to be in keeping with other United States court decisions that the United States Constitutional amendments are binding on Congress only, and not upon state legislatures, for Sunday laws are purely and simply religious legislation, sustained on that ground only, and this decision it is said is based upon the fact that King was convicted under due process of Tennessee law, and it is not in the province of the federal court to review the case. The judge says that it is not necessary to maintain that to violate the Sunday observance custom shall be of itself immoral to make it criminal in the eyes of the law. It may be harmless in itself because, as the petitioner believes, God has not set apart that day for rest and holiness to work Sunday, and yet, if man has set it apart in due form by his law for rest, it must be obeyed as man's law if not as God's law. By this, it is seen, any legislature can establish religious holydays, enforce their observance, and the United States courts afford no redress. We do not believe this is good law; it certainly is monstrously unjust.

In one of his decisions Chief-justice Cooley said on the subject of religious legislation: "The Jew who is forced to respect the first day of the week when his conscience requires of him the observance of the seventh also, may plausibly urge that the law discriminates against his religion, and by forcing him to keep a second Sabbath in each week, unjustly, though by indirection, punishes him for his belief." This applies to the Seventh Day Adventist and the Infidel as well as to the Jew, and if the Constitutional amendment has no force in the states it ought to be amended again. We hope the Adventists will carry the case still higher.

Letters from Friends.

Even a Last Year's Bird's Nest.

HORTONVILLE, WIS., July 13, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $5, for which send me THE TRUTH SEEKER for two years. Accept thanks for the copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER of Oct. 4, 1890. I am glad to receive anything in line of Freethought. I would accept a last year's bird's nest if its bearing was in that line.

Respectfully yours, WM. JONES.

John Peck Again.

SALMON CITY, July 14, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $5 to apply on my subscrip tion. THE TRUTH SEEKER is excellent in every respect. John Peck is my ideal writer. He givs sledge-hammer blows that count. We need a number of small and short tracts of his style, that will expose the heinous doings of the Christian church. The reason I say "short" is, people will read short articles when they will not long ones.

Yours for Universal Mental Liberty, L. C. GEERTSON.

A Venerable Well-Wisher.

WATERLOO, N. Y., June 8, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I send you the subscription for 1892. I would be glad to send you ten times that amount did my condition permit, but the weight of eighty-five years, with many accidents to break up the organization, leaves but little chance to do much for myself or others. Yet I am as desirous the good work in which you are engaged should go on and prosper as I ever was, and I hope, ay, I do hope, your patrons may respond so heartily that it will free you from all embarrassment. With good wishes and kindest regards, I am, as ever, Ever yours, HENRY BONNELL.

Help to the Cause.

ASPEN, COL., July 14, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $6 50—$3 for the grand and noble TRUTH SEEKER; $1 to help sustain the pictures; $2 for the "Pictorial Text-Book;" 25 cents for the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL; and 25 cents for postage on "Text-book" and ANNUAL.

There seems to be a stagnation in business all over the country. I hav lived in hopes for many years, and still do, that I will realize something in mining, so that I can do some material good for the Liberal cause.

Wishing you and all admirers of the grand old TRUTH SEEKER a long life and prosperity, including Mr. Heston (he is a brick), Faithfully yours, JOHN ENGSTROM.

Anti-Prohibition.

NORFOLK, NEB., July 17, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I see your readers are whacking away at one another. Some are going to liv forever; others are taking the short route to liv forever no more. I am an Agnostic. I do not know. Nor do I care; as long as I hav good health I want to liv right along. Then, again, there are others that are crazy on Prohibition. They will hav persons to eat and drink as they do or "bust." We hav a village of about four thousand inhabitants. We hav eleven saloons, each paying $1,000 per year license, and no drunkards except those coming from temperance states, working in the beet fields. We hav the largest and best beet sugar factory in the world, and will build another of the same size next year. Six thousand acres will be planted to beets next spring. How is that for whisky? We do not want any reformed drunkards here. We want the genuin. They giv the best example. They are worth a hundred temperance lectures.

JOHN GEIGER.

Counsel from Age.

FUNKSTOWN, MD., July 4, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: As to the paper I hav no suggestions to offer at present. I am interested most in the total separation of church and state, and the destruction of superstition and priestcraft. I am not so much interested in the discussion going on in the paper on the subject of Spiritualism. And yet I hav a very friendly feeling for Spiritualists; they are good Liberals. I was rejoiced to see the predicament you placed our holy postmaster-general in, and hope the matter can be pressed until the bigots can be brought to a sense of justice.

I am now in my seventy-seventh year. I hav taken the paper so long that I cannot well do without it. I must say I am very much in favor of Heston and the pictures. They certainly add much to the interest and value of the paper. But I hav had, and still hav, no fault to find with the paper as it is. Go on with the good work. I am with you to the extent of my ability. SAMUEL GANTZ.

Kind Advice.

BLOOMDALE, O., July 9, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: THE TRUTH SEEKER comes pretty well up to my notions of fearless and bold expressions, and being a journal of "Freethought and Reform," the variety of subjects might be multiplied and cover too much space, but being principally opposed to all ancient and antiquated forms of worship and creeds and for the discussion of any questions bearing on the above, it does very well. It would be a little selfish and illiberal to say we could do with less Spiritualism and hypnotism. I would say that, being chiefly anti-orthodox or opposed to all ancient forms of worship, and for the dissemination of Freethought, let THE TRUTH SEEKER stick to the text and giv us all there is to be said on that score. Tell us what the church round the world is doing and what she is not doing; any scientific news; all or any news about our great men, Colonel Robert always counted in, and what he has to say; and perhaps an occasional article on any of the other subjects. Take it right through, I think THE TRUTH SEEKER already answers or comports with what I hav outlined. Yours, etc., C. C. GERMANN.

Unfortunate.

SANQUOIT, July 8, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I am highly pleased with the management of THE TRUTH SEEKER. It is a bold and fearless sheet, and deals deathblows at priestcraft and popular superstition, and gently leads the sincere inquirer after truth safely along the pathway of knowledge, truth, and wisdom. And may it ever continue to prosper, and shine, a star of the first magnitude, along the pathway of sincere inquirers after truth. But it is with feelings of inexpressible sorrow and sadness that environments mightier than myself compel me to order a stop for a while of the weekly visit of the glorious TRUTH SEEKER. I cannot pay for it. I am seventy years old in October next; poor in this world's wealth, yes, poor as the (so-called) Jesus Christ was when he said he "had not where to lay his head." But I am supremely rich in those imperishable treasures which I hav gained from the truthful teachings of THE TRUTH SEEKER, namely, knowledge, wisdom, and goodness, which through the almighty power of evolution will go with me through the last chemical change (death so-called), and travel by my side throughout the mighty roll of a never-ending eternity.

Yours very sincerely, J. P. SMITH.

Warned Against the Day of Wrath.

LOCKPORT, N. Y., July 1, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been a constant reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER from its initial number until the present. I think if you take the trouble to examin you will find my name among the first patrons of your Infidel paper. Bennett was the king of Infidels since the days of Thomas Paine and Voltaire, while you in your feeble, inefficient way are doing your best to travel in their footsteps. I hav been waiting a long time hoping to see some signs of contrition, but your hard heart still continues to grow harder. I am forced to believe that nothing but a special miracle will ever cause you to change your course in sin and cussedness. I fear the good God will knock you down, strike you blind, take away your appetite for three days, and call to you from heaven to repent, even as he did to that prince of apostles, the blessed St. Paul. And those ridiculous, coarse, and unrefined pictures by Heston of the saints and prophets of blessed memory who were the salt of the earth of olden times! Let me warn you both that they who stiffen their necks and harden their hearts against reproof shall suddenly be cut off and that without remedy. But as I am always in the habit of reading on all sides from the worst, and I consider your paper the most daring in blasphemy to the best, I inclose check to renew my subscription for two years. Hoping that you will become a better and a wiser man, I am,

Your sincere friend, ISAAC ALLEN.

Let Religion, the Chief Evil, be the Chief Subject.

BUFFALO VALLEY, TENN., July 21, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been a subscriber to your valuable paper for four months, and I can say that I think it the best paper published in the United States. It is doing more to clear the mind of superstition than any other paper that I can think of. The paper is my ideal. It is good enough as it is. I would suggest, as religion, or the Christian Bible, has bred more dishonesty than all other topics, that you let that be the chief subject. I am surrounded with Christian churches, and I hav shown the picture of Elisha and his two she-bears to some of them, and I must say that, to my surprise, some would say that they could not believe that God had anything to do with it. So go on, grand old TRUTH SEEKER. May you find your way to every home in the world, and clear that home of the filth that Holy John thinks will keep him as postmaster-general. If I understand the English language, in the last chapter of St. John, twenty-fifth verse, you will find the biggest lie ever told: "And there are also many other things which Jesus did, the which if they should be written every one, I suppose that even the world itself could not contain the books that should be written." How in the name of common sense can any man or woman believe such a thing, even with brains enough to make an ant a mess?

Send me, when ready, Heston's pictures, and such literature as you think proper for me to hand to superstitious Christians. M. BARTLETT.

Bible Immoralities.

SEATTLE, WASH., July 15, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: You will find inclosed $5, for which I would like the books below named; the balance, $2 25, is for the pictures of THE TRUTH SEEKER. My having been a constant reader of your paper for the past three years is sufficient proof that I admire your efforts and mode in seeking for the truth. However, I am sorry to say, we are unable to present these truths to the Christian world. Christians are too prejudiced to read but one side, and I dare say many fail even to do that. They do not realize the effect that one-sided, false training has on the child. Sunday-school children are taught by their teachers that the good little children are those who attend Sunday-school, thus making them prejudiced against the good found outside. In Deut. xiv, 21, the Lord is made to speak to a grown-up special class in a way that leads one to think that the Lord, like some people to-day, is extremely partial. He is represented as telling his chosen people not to eat of anything that dieth of itself: "Thou shalt giv it unto the stranger that is in thy gates that he may eat it, or thou mayest sell it to an alien; for thou art a holy people unto the Lord thy God." 'Tis true such inhuman teachings do not, to a great extent, affect more than a few, but I would advise those who think such teachings hav no bad effect to examin the criminal records of the world. Also the twenty-sixth verse of the same chapter imparts an immoral and intemperate lesson which is being practiced by many to-day. When will the people see the simple truth? JAY T. PARKER.

A Brush with Pietists.

HARMONY, IND., July 10, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: From general gossip, Holy John has got about all he can break off just now.

We had a Fourth of July picnic at Harmony, under the Independent Order of Odd Fellows. Professor Basset, of Greencastle, delivered the oration, and it was a good one. Commencing at the foundation of the government, he went on to eulogize it; dwelt particularly on the arts and sciences, showing the improvements and patents; said we hav the best education, best machinery, and finest mechanics in the world, etc., but he failed to giv the Bible one syllable of credit for all this. I would hav liked to say, it is because there is more Infidelity in the United States than in any other nation in the world.

A few days ago four theological cranks jumped me about a remark I made about the soul or spirit. I asked them which was first, the soul or spirit, or the body. They said the soul, and the body grew up or around it. Said I: "Thank you, gentlemen, for the suggestion. That reminds me of the Irishman's plan for making cannon. Says Jim to Pat, 'Pat, how do they get the hole in the cannon?' 'Och, ye spalpeen, they make the hole first, thin put the iron round it.' There is as much sense in the one as the other." That raised a little fog. I said, "Sing the doxology. I'll see you again." I hav seen them, but it seems my harness does not fit them, and they balk.

Giv it them, Heston! Let the tiger loose! Long liv the old TRUTH SEEKER! JESSE MAURER.

Lonely for Liberal Association.

CANNING, NOVA SCOTIA, June 23, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been trying to find some subscribers, but find it uphill work in a place like this. Canning is a village of six hundred inhabitants. It has some four churches, and several more within a radius of four miles. Most denominations are represented, so you can see plainly why it is so hard to send you any subscribers. There are lots of men who will talk reasonably to me and indorse quite all I say in private but are afraid to let it be known. I came here some twenty years ago, and at that time it was even worse than now, for they were going to hav me taken up for playing fast music on the Sabbath; but that idea has exploded now, for some of them will stop now on their way to church to hear a hornpipe if I happen to be playing one on Sunday morning. I hav it all my own way now. None of the ministers care to hav an encounter with me. They are compelled, however, to say, "Well, the old man Baxter is no hypocrit, and I would take his word for anything, but oh, he is such an Infidel!" This they hav thrown up to my children, but when I told them that was just what suited me my children did not feel bad about it. I often wish I lived in a place where I could associate with men like those that write in THE TRUTH SEEKER—for instance, John Peck. His article on the Exposition in Chicago in the last TRUTH SEEKER suits me to a charm. As for the policy of the paper, it is none too strong for me. You hav got to meet those Christians on their own ground and fight them with their own weapons. I like your paper very much, and shall continue to take it and do what I can here for the cause, but it cannot be much.

I send $1, part for the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL, the balance you can send me in whatever you like, and any tracts or papers you see fit to send I will do my best to distribute.

Wishing THE TRUTH SEEKER and all other Liberal papers every success, and hoping at some time to contribute something more useful to it, I am,

Yours very sincerely, A. B. BAXTER.

A Bright Future Anticipated.

MILES CITY, MONT., July 20, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $2 50, for which send me the "Pictorial Text-Book;" also a copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER for June 20th with the picture of the troubles of a thankful man, to send East. I was raised a strict Presbyterian, and at one time I thought the Christian doctrin must be true because so many believed it. But finally I began to think about this subject, and before I read any Freethought literature reason would not permit me to accept the Christian scheme as truth. The prevalence of the Christian belief is easily accounted for by ignorance and fear, and when one considers the powerful influence that is brought to bear on the young. We are taught to believe in and fear a personal being called God who exists somewhere, nowhere, everywhere, and nobody knows where, and that we are continually in danger of being consigned to everlasting torture by that "eternal tyrant." We are taught to be afraid of his hell, and believe in his heaven, and in another personal being called the devil (who is vested with equally as much if not more power than their God, for according to the Bible, if that is any proof, the devil gets the large majority of the human race for his place of abode). He also exists in the same place as their God, wherever that is—I will leave for some Christian to answer. I believe I hear reason asserting that the truth is, they exist only in the imagination. This Christian belief is instilled in the very depths of our minds from infancy up to manhood and womanhood as the one important truth above all others, and thousands of dollars are annually spent in the propagation of that belief. Is it at all strange that so many cling to that Christian belief with the grip of a handshaking preacher and the tenacity of an octopus? I went to church not long ago and there were less than twenty people there; the preacher waited and delayed his sermon for the pews to fill up, but in vain, and at last arose with a woebegone countenance and proceeded to thank the Lord his "troubles were no worse." If all those lazy, smooth-tongued preachers could only be made to go to work and earn an honest living, what a blessing would be conferred upon humanity. I find a great many Freethinkers in the clear, bracing air of Montana, and believe Liberalism is advancing rapidly, and I hope there will be more Ingersolls to help free this great American land from the dark cloud of ignorance and superstition—which science is helping dissolve as fast as possible. When people will use their reason and learn to accept the clear, plain truth as it is, then, I believe, the world will advance and be a brighter place of abode for the great mass of humanity, who will be made happier and will advance in proportion as they use their reason. Who knows what will be the limit of their capabilities?

Hygienic Therapeutics.

CAMP ALAMO, L. C., July 9, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: We are often amazed at the raids made on the medical profession as a whole, denouncing doctors of all schools as humbugs and villains of the deepest dye, as if all medical doctors were of the regular school and were opposed to the spread of knowledge, the welfare of the people, etc. Now, for the benefit of the boy and girl readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER I propose to state a few facts.

That there is a class of doctors who call themselvs regulars, who would stay the progress of medical science and speculate on the ills that afflict humanity, is too well known to need reiterating; but to place all doctors under that head is just as absurd and as far from truth as the assertion often made by Christians that "all the crimes committed are committed by Infidels, such as Robert G. Ingersoll." I will ask all candid readers to re-read the third paragraph of Mr. Shepherd's article, and view it through a microscope, compare it with the books and periodicals of the day on hygeian rational therapeutics, etc., and tell us, O ye gods—truth seekers, or whoever can solve the vexing problem—how can any reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER make a statement so far from truth.

Galen is the first on record to hav made any discovery of note after the establishment of the allopathic system, which system I consider has done more harm than good. Contrairi contraris curantur is an abominable theory that is gradually going out of favor as a basis for a system of medical science.

For the benefit of those who do not know that there has been any advance in medical science since the allopathic system was founded, we will introduce Dr. Trall, who was a graduate of an allopathic medical school, who studied medicin from an honest scientific standpoint, with a view to regaining his own health; but failing, on the allopathic system, his fertil brain formulated a hygienic system of therapeutics—founded a medical school, was professor of therapeutics, for as much as thirty years. I will just giv some of the principles of the hygienic system of therapeutics. All healing power is inherent in the living system. There is no curativ virtue in medicins nor in anything outside of the living organism. Disease is not, as is commonly supposed, an enemy at war with the vital organism, but a condition—a remedial effort—to be directed and regulated. The business of the physician is to assist nature, not to administer poison. Nature's materia medica consists of air, light, temperature, electricity, magnetism, exercise, rest, food, drink, bathing, sleep, clothing, passional influence, conditions for cheerfulness, and mechanical or surgical appliances.

The true healing art consists in supplying whatever of the above the system needs, and thus assisting nature. The Hygeio Therapeutic Medical School was in running order at least forty years, graduating students at the rate of from thirty to fifty annually. Besides, there are many graduates of the allopath schools whose common sense leads them to practice and teach a rational system. There are fully twenty-five or thirty institutions in running order in the United States capable of containing from fifty to two hundred patients, where the above remedial agents are employed, most of their proprietors publishing a periodical to disseminate the principles of the true healing art, which are also the principles on which to keep well. Dr. Jackson, of Dansville, N. Y., is one; Dr. Holbrook, No. 15 Laight street, another, where books and periodicals can be obtained. The Sanitary Publishing Company, Chicago, Ill., is another place to obtain literature on hygeio-therapy (besides others).

Now, I would advise friend Shepherd to post himself before placing all doctors in a regular tent and firing artillery at them under a misnomer.

It is to be hoped that friend Shepherd and others who waste so much space in THE TRUTH SEEKER and other journals that ought to contain straight truth only, will occupy some of their precious time in informing themselvs on the doings of the many worthy doctors who labor with pen and tongue to redeem the world from the false teachings of the so-called regular system.

It is enough for Christians to shut their eyes and declare the sun does not shine; professed Liberalists should be better employed. For truth, progress, etc., in all things,

N. A. PICKENS, M.D.

Such Doth the Blood of Jesus Save.

HAMBURG, July 26, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: On reading the sketch sent in by Martin Butler and published in THE TRUTH SEEKER of July 18th, headed "Defects in Christian Charity," also the poem, "They Turned Her Out in the Street," a train of thought was awakened which I hav endeavored to express in the following poem, which, if you find it worthy of publication, I send for that purpose.

And what became of the model man
Whose promises led her astray?
Is he too a wanderer in the street,
Hopelessly waiting the dawn of day?

Is he helping her bear the terrible shame?
Is he sharing with her the vigil of death?
Does the wind that froze the baby's tears
Chill him with its pitiless stinging breath?

Hav they turned him into the street with her?
Do they sneer and scoff as he passes by?
Is there no sheltering home for him?
Is he too turned into the street to die?

Alas, be it said to humanity's shame,
The pitiless hands that drag her down
Are upholding the man who gained her love
Only to spurn it with sneer and frown.

Ah, she was only a child in years,
"Her hopes were ruined, her love beguiled,"
Yet she begged in vain for shelter and food.
They turned her out, for she "was defiled."

But to him they extend a friendly hand,
And the church with open arms will receive
The wandering sinner, now returned,
For which their hearts so long hav grieved.

And "our dear pastor" givs to him
The warm right-hand of fellowship;
The "sisters" laud him to the skies
Because "he has given the devil the slip."

His numerous sins are all forgiven,
His crown and harp are now assured.
But his victim in the streets must die
Of pain and shame, for him endured.

O justice, loud we call thy name!
Come, right the wrongs of this sad world,
Where Christian (?) pastors turn deaf ear
To homeless, friendless, ruined girls

Who loved "not wisely but too well"
The idol which they set on high,
Only to see it, shattered, fall
And low in dust in fragments lie.

Even Nature, with relentless force,
Pursued the lonely friendless child.
Death proved her only friend at last
On that cold, stormy night so wild.

But the winds that chilled her tender form
And the cold that froze the baby's tears
Left no such sharp and bitter pain
As did the people's taunts and sneers.

Kinder to her was Death than life;
He soothed her aching heart and brain.
Even the baby's tears he dried—
Sheltered them both from cold and pain.

"Loving" and "trusting" was the crime,
Her life the penalty she gave,
But her betrayer can go free
For such doth "the blood of Jesus save."

Yours for truth, MRS. F. W. TOEDT.

Government Can Make Money.

COOK, NEB., July 7, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: In a recent issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER you reproduced a report of an interview of Col. R. G. Ingersoll from the Philadelphia Press in which the colonel is made to say: "I want to ask this one question: If the government can make money, why collect taxes? Why not make what it needs and quit bothering the people?" With your permission, I want to ask this one question: If the government cannot make money, is not the law for the punishment of counterfeiting superfluous? Now, colonel, do we hav money, or what is that thing we call money? If it is beyond the power of government to make money, by what authority do we hav that which we call money? But enough; such questions are too foolish, too ridiculous. And yet they are just as sensible as the questions you hav asked. The government can make money, and does make all the money we hav. Its power to make money is derived from the same source that makes of it a government, and that power is of all of the people. It is that which individuals cannot do, which by mutual agreement they all do, that constitutes that thing which we call government. And in this agreement we hav said it shall be the business of the government to "establish justice, contract alliances, establish commerce," and to do all other acts and things that governments hav a right to do. Well, the government has a right to protect its subjects. And we, being cognizant of this fact and fearing that some fellow (Colonel Ingersoll, perhaps) might take it into his head to make what money he "needs," and by so doing get a spurious article into circulation to the great detriment of the people, declare that this right shall be the duty of the government, and so say, "Congress shall hav power to coin [make] money and regulate the value thereof."

The old barbaric notion that metal was the only material on which the quality of money could be impressed, was the father to the idea that the metal was the money. Consequently, the ignorant look upon the matter that bears the impress of money and with their wonderful powers of reasoning exclaim, The government "can't" make that. Why, of course not. Any fool ought to know that the government cannot make matter, and every fool ought to know that matter is not money. It is that which is imparted to the matter by law that is money. Perhaps all law, to some one or another, may seem arbitrary; but, as I hav already intimated, it is a surrendering of individual rights in part that is formulated into the compact or agreement that can be properly called government, "in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselvs and our posterity." We hav consented that the right to make money shall be the right of the government, and not the right of any individual or any corporation of individuals. Now, here we find cause for complaint. The servants who hav been elected to do the business of the government hav been farming out to corporations that right which belongs exclusivly to the government, and by their so doing they hav produced a system of finance that is not conduciv to the general welfare of all the people. Contrary to every principle that was entered into by the compact they hav built up a financial system that has been more destructiv to the interest of the farmers and producers than worms and bugs, cyclones and hailstorms, hog cholera and drouths; and the colonel seems to scorn the idea of the farmers and laborers going into conference together to see if there is not some way to get the government back where justice can be again established.

But why this worry about taxes? Ought not the government to receive pay for its work as well as an individual? Surely the colonel is not so stupid as to think the government can work for nothing and board itself and liv any more than he can. And for the government to make all the money it needs without taxing the people is, to say the least, original with the colonel, and calls to mind the scriptural injunction, "Answer a fool according to his folly." That is: You say the government cannot make money; that being the case, individuals must; so why don't you make what you need and quit charging your clients?

Money, being an invention for the purpose of representing products and facilitating the exchange of such products, can not be made to perform that part in the exchange of products and the economy of government without possessing a quality that we know that nothing else does or can possess, and it is that which makes it money. Now, solving this problem will show just what money is. The power to pay debt—this is money. Whether that debt be public or private, a money must, to be a true money, cancel every obligation, and it is only the right that government has that does or can giv to it that power. Now, what is the best thing to use to represent products and perform this duty? Will anyone tell me the value of a dollar? Is there any possible way of knowing? If there is anyone living that does know the exact value of a dollar and will divulge the secret, I will pledge to giv $100 for the knowledge. The power of the government to regulate and fix a value thereof does not mean, as many people believe, that it has the power to fix a certain value to any product, for if it does possess this power and can fix the value of one product it can and should fix the value of every other product, so that one product would hav no advantage over another. And so of price. If Congress has the power to fix the price of gold, which is a product just as much as anything else produced by labor, and say that twenty-eight and eight-tenths grains shall be worth $1, it certainly has the power to fix a certain weight of iron, lead, coal, cotton, rice, wheat, potatoes, etc., and say, that shall be sold for $1 also. But Congress possesses no such power. It is a usurper, and goes beyond the rights granted. If the government has the right to say that twenty-five and eight-tenths grains gold shall sell for $1, it has the right to say ten, fifty, or five hundred grains shall sell for $1 also. But this kind of value has no part or function of money; has nothing whatever to do with the value of money. All the value that money does hav or can hav is its value made by law. Any product can be used in making money, but the value of the product used, whether it be more or less, adds nothing to its legal or money value. This being true (and I hold that nobody can show that it is not), then for the "general welfare," that all may be protected by this legal thing called money, no product should be used in the making or the impressing of this legal quality thereon that possesses any other value that might affect in any way its value as money. Now, colonel, suppose you were the one employed to do this work. If you are not too dull, try to catch this idea. It is for the people this government is working, for while making their money, it enables them to facilitate exchange, to "establish commerce" and "promote the general welfare." These are some of the benefits to be derived, and the government has no power to make money to pay itself, only to make the people's money, that they may and can pay all debts public and private, and that this expense may be equally divided among all the people, each paying his just proportion for services rendered by the government. The right "to lay and collect tax" is a governmental right, and thus you are enabled to do the work of the government and liv, because you get through tax this legal thing—money—for your labor.

Now, the most grievous error in regard to money is this. I am living in a farming district a thousand miles away from any gold mines. I am producing values a thousand times more beneficial in continuing human life than the product gold. I hav this debt to settle, and the law says: "You cannot make settlement with that which you hav produced. You must go to the mines, to the gold mines, a thousand miles away, and procure gold, and then hav the money quality impressed upon it, before settlement can be made." But I say: "I cannot do this. I want to pay with the products of my own labor." But the law says, "No." I want to know why, and the only answer that can be given is that some tyrant who wants to get my products for less than they can be produced has said that "gold is the only possible real money." And through this damnable gold robbing money system the real wealth-producers of the world are being swindled and robbed by a set of thieves who hav less honor and principle than the veriest villain that ever "scuttled ship or cut a throat." And to think that intelligent men would aid and abet these scoundrels by misinterpreting the plain letter of the compact that has been entered into to secure the blessings of liberty and equality, is beyond my comprehension. Respectfully, W. P. BROOKS.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Abraham Lincoln.

When the dark clouds of rebellion
Lowered above the nation's flag—
When that banner was insulted
As a vile, dishonored rag—
Mighty Lincoln ruled the tempest,
Cleared the threatening clouds away,
Placed that banner in its glory,
Where it proudly floats to-day.

When the blighting curse of slavery
Held the colored race in chains;
When the cruel whip resounded,
While inflicting bitter pains,
Great, noble-hearted Lincoln
Proudly grasped his mighty pen,
And four million fettered children
Breathed Freedom's air again.

His lofty mind was crowded
With thoughts of work undone,
And fate's hand often pointed
To the setting of the sun.
But guided by a star of hope,
And conscious of the right,
He pushed ahead and heralded
The dawning of the light.

Just as the day was breaking,
And sweet peace again returned,
When the nation was rejoicing
At the triumph nobly earned,
This noble-hearted savior,
After all those trying years,
Fell by the fiendish coward,
And the nation was in tears.

Meteors or Falling Stars.

Who does not admire shooting or falling stars, and wonder what they are and whence they come?

Many suggestions, explanations, and surmises hav from time to time been put forth concerning them.

"According to Moslem tradition, the evil genii are accustomed to fly at night up to the confines of heaven, in order to overhear the conversation of the angels, and the shooting stars are the fiery arrows hurled by the latter at their lurking foes, with so good an aim that, we are told, for every falling star we may be sure there is one spirit of evil less in the world."

In one way this is a pretty conceit, but would it not hav been prettier had each evil spirit been so impressed by angelic purity and perfection as to hav been regenerated and made gloriously good thereby?

But we, who do not believe in heavens, angels, spirits, or vengeance, must seek some more reasonable solution of the meteoric problem.

It now seems to be the accepted opinion of scientific astronomers, that the shooting or falling stars are fragments of some old worn-out, exploded, or otherwise broken-up world, and that those fragments were hurled into space with such a force as to hav been traveling around in an immense orbit ever since, and that once in about thirty-three years our earth crosses the main track of these meteors, and as they touch or come in contact with the atmosphere they are arrested by the force of the concussion and hurled from their orbits and fall to the earth.

Although comparativly few of them are seen by us, yet it is supposed that ten million of these falling stars—taking the whole world over—fall to the earth every night.

The great periodical thirty-three years' shower will again occur in 1899.

The most of these shooting-stars are no larger than a cherry-seed. "They are invisible till they shine out by the light produced by their own fusion [melting]. Each moves on in its own track, but the general direction of the tracks is all the same. Each is an independent planetoid, flying with a hundred times the speed of a rifle-bullet on its separate way, as far out as the orbit of Uranus, coming back three times in a century to about the earth's distance from the sun, and repeating this march forever, unless it happens to strike the atmosphere of the earth, when there comes a sudden flash of fire from the contact, and the distinct existence of the little body, which may hav lasted for hundreds of thousands of years, is ended in a second. . . . Compare the flight of these bodies to a thin swarm of swift-flying birds, so immensely long as to be, in spite of rapid motion, several years in passing a given point, and whose line of flight is cut across by us on the 13th of November, when the earth passes through it. We are there only on that day, and can only see it then; but the swarm is years in all getting by, and so we may pass into successiv portions of it on the anniversary of the same day for years to come."

It looks to us as if the little stars might hit together and run into each other, but really they are more than ten miles apart. Imagin two cherry-seeds flying through the air ten miles apart, and you will see their chances of hitting each other are almost inconceivable—"to each grain there are nearly ten million cubic miles of void space."

Small as each little meteor is, yet they come so thick and fast as to add probably one hundred tons a day to the weight of the earth—thirty-six thousand five hundred tons a year. They are, as a rule, dissipated—turned into gaseous matter—from fifty to seventy miles in the upper air above the clouds, and come down in the form of a very fine, invisible dust from far above the highest clouds. Many of the large meteoric stones that fall to the earth are red-hot, and others are stone-cold.

The heat is caused by the force with which the stone strikes the atmosphere, and the speed with which it is rushed through it, and consequently, when a large stone explodes on its way and falls in different pieces, the ones from the center of the meteor may be ice-cold instead of red-hot, just as you can bake ice-cream cake in a very hot oven and hav the ice still frozen. AUNT ELMINA.

Rule by Love.

Time is worth more to me than almost anything else, but I can spare enough to express astonishment that any but a religious person should use any means but love and reason and patience with his own children or any other person's. But to read that one person would shut his son out all night because he was not prompt in coming in, is to me a most extraordinary thing. When legislators make laws encroaching on our liberties we ask, "Where do you get the authority?" Where does a parent get the authority to deal tyrannically with a child? I remember too well what bitter, hateful feeling filled my little heart when as a child I found myself in the grasp of irresistible power. Not a week ago I was remonstrating with a father, being but a childless bachelor myself, about whipping his boy of three years, and he said there was no other way to get at him. The next day I heard the little fellow say to a companion, "I won't love you if you do that," and I at once called the father's attention to the boy's estimation of love as a motiv of conduct. If it were beyond your power to overcome a child by superior strength you would not do it, neither ought you to do it if it is in your power. Children ought to be disciplined and made to understand that there are such things as rules of conduct. It is a disaster to many a boy's future career to grow up without any idea of obedience or restraint, but if you want him to grow up a devotee of reason begin on him with reason early. I was eighteen years old before I suspected at all that my father loved me, though beneath the stern rules of Bible severity his heart was all devotion to his children. When I saw that my mother was dead, the first thought that came to me, then a man, was that never in her life had she spoken a cross word to me or struck me. LIBERAL.

A Trick with a Glass of Water.

Here is a simple and interesting little experiment enabling one to trace sound vibrations in a glass of water. Take a fine, thin glass, such as will giv forth a musical sound if rubbed with wet fingers around the rim. Fill it nearly full of water, and, having wiped the edges dry and smooth, place upon the rim a cross made of two equal strips of thin cardboard (an old postal card will do for the material), with the four ends bent down at right angles, so as to prevent its slipping off.

Now if you gently rub the outside surface of the glass with a wet finger it will sing, or giv forth a sonorous musical note. But the principal phenomenon which you are to observe in this experiment is the following: If your finger rubs the glass below one of the ends of the cardboard strips the cross will not stir; but if, on the contrary, you rub any other part of the glass not in a perpendicular line with one of the four ends of the cross, this latter will turn of its own accord until the end of the cardboard arms of the cross arrives at a point directly above the spot where you are rubbing with your finger. Thus, by placing your whole forefinger around the middle of the glass, you can make the cross turn at will, as if by magic, without touching it at all.

This experiment demonstrates the existence of what are called, in the science of acoustics, the nodes or knots of vibration in sonorous bodies. These nodes are the four points on the rim of the glass at which the arms of the cross stop. The ventral spaces between these points are where the sound vibration is the strongest, and where, consequently, the branches of the cardboard cannot rest.—New York World.

Correspondence.

PROCTOR, MO., July 18, 1891.

MISS SUSAN H. WIXON: This is my second letter to the Corner. But it has been so long I was almost afraid to try again, but I took courage once more.

Our town is quite small—just two stores, a blacksmith's shop, and six dwelling-houses; but it is a pleasant place. We liv on a hillside with some flowers, and wild birds, which sing around us.

I am not going to school now, for school is out, but will begin again in September. I shall study at home, for my teacher is a very good church-member and she has no use for me, as my parents do not belong to the church. I hav two brothers: Blake, who is twenty, and Harry, who is ten, and my age I will not tell, but you can judge by my letter that I am not very old or very bright, just as you think best.

My father was once a preacher, but now he has made quite a change and has no use for religion; and all the people around are trying to get him to join the church. I would be greatly pleased to hav the boys and girls of the Children's Corner write to me, as I like to get letters. I guess I had better close, for if this does not find its way to the waste-basket, I will be surprised for once.

Your true friend, ETTA TALBOTT.

INDIAN GROVE, MO., July 22, 1891.

MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Dear Friend: Begging your kind indulgence, we wish to contribute the following to the "What the Little Ones are Saying" department of the Corner.

Having returned with the family of a friend from church service one cold winter evening several years ago, we, while sitting around a cheerful fire, discussed the merits of Brother Shelton's late effort, which, be it observed, was an elaborate doctrinal sermon. The conversation was suddenly interrupted by little Ines, a bright, intelligent child of seven or eight summers, who exclaimed in a tone that clearly indicated that she, at that very moment, had caught an idea: "Pa! oh, pa! I know who is not a gentleman." The father, with an expression of unusual interest, replied, "Who, my dear? Who is not a gentleman?" "Why, Brother Shelton is the man. You know, pa, that you said that gentlemen never call other people fools, and I heard Brother Shelton say, that if a man did not believe there is a God he is a fool." "Oh, well, my dear, you must not be too hard on Brother Shelton; he is a nice man. What he said was quoted from the Bible." "Pa, does the Bible call people fools?" "That is just what it says." "Do you think that is right, pa?" "Yes, it is certainly very foolish and absurd to affirm that there is no God. And it is foolish and absurd to declare that there is a God. The wise and prudent avoid both extremes by saying either, 'I believe,' or, 'I believe not, that there is a God.'" It is safe to say that right here we caught an idea that has developed through subsequent investigation and research, culminating at last in clearing away the mist of superstition that for a time so completely obscured our mental horizon. Those little ones are sometimes the most dangerous critics to be encountered. W. C. WALTON.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. Price 25 cents.

OTTO WETTSTEIN,
ROCHELLE, ILL.

Send 10 cents for this valuable book for young and middle-aged men, suffering from a Life-wasting Disease, as the result of youthful follies, indiscretion, and excesses in maturer years. It sets forth an External Application—A POSITIVE CURE, as it matters not how long standing, how hopeless or how many remedies you hav used. The book is worth many times its cost, and should be in the hands of those seeking a speedy and permanent cure. Address Dr. Robt. P. Fellows, Vineland, N. J., and say where you saw this advertisment.

A GOOD WORD.

Dr. Fellows is an outspoken Liberal, a humanitarian, and a generous patron of the Freethought press. He has many testimonials to the value of his progressive and successful method of treatment, and deserves patronage.—Freethought.

News of the Week.

MISSIONARIES in Foo Choo, China, are in danger.

ON Sunday the 26th ult. 5,000 pilgrims visited the shrine of St. Anne de Beaupre.

THE holy coat of Treves is expected to draw 2,000,000 pilgrims in the six weeks beginning on the 18th.

FRESH trouble has risen between the pope and the Italian government over the closing of several churches, necessitated by government confiscation of their revenue.

IN China there is discontent that may ultimate in a revolution. European powers watching to grab something from China may then become involved in serious rivalries.

THE Protestant churches may hav at the World's Fair an exhibit of their progress in this country—their statistics, publications, education, evangelistic work, charities, history, and biography.

THE famous French writer on scripture, Abbe Vigoroux, in the numbers of his Dictionary which hav appeared attacks evolution as proved false by the chapter of Genesis describing man's creation.

Now that the Vatican has recognized the French republic and ostensibly become reconciled to republicanism, France may be set on by papal influence to coerce Italy into restoring the pope's temporal power.

THE worst of the reports of Blaine's illness is that he is in the third stage of Bright's disease. His supporters deny this, and attribute his care of himself to an undue tendency which he has always had to worry over ailments.

ONE good act among the many bad ones in Russia is the order of the governor of Nijni-Novgorod to punish and expel from his dominion all who attempt to corner the grain market or trade on the growing necessities of the people.

SIX thousand Flemings hav thanked Leo XIII. for "the luminous instruction contained in his encyclical" on labor. The pope also receives thanks for that work from persons and societies in all lands. Five thousand copies of it hav been distributed in Lyons streets.

To prevent repetition of the fights between Greek and Roman Catholics in the holy grotto of the Nativity at Bethlehem, the governor of that place, in accordance with orders from Constantinople, will forbid to the Greek Catholics admittance to the grotto by the north entry.

IN a thunder-storm at Hartford the other day the electric fluid penetrated the county jail, flickered weirdly up and down the corridors, played about the cell-doors, and "so terrified the prisoners that scores of them fell on their knees and prayed aloud and in shaking tones."

INGALLS is lecturing. He said at Port Richmond, N. Y., on the 1st: "Republican institutions are still on trial, and in the second century distress and violence in company may work an evil in comparison with which the perils of the civil war were pueril." Maldistribution of wealth he deems the chief evil.

A FRENCH fleet is visiting Russian ports and enjoying hospitalities and honors. Russian papers do not hesitate to intimate the joint hostility of Russia and France against the Triple Alliance. The Novoe Vremya says that it is not for the Triple Alliance and England, but for Russia and France, to dictate their will to Europe.

IN the three Connecticut colleges, Yale, Trinity, and Wesleyan, attendance at morning prayers is made obligatory upon the students, but at a considerably later hour than was in vogue a generation ago. Students at the Sheffield Scientific School of Yale are exempted from the prayer rule, and, in the absence of any explanation for the distinction, the academic youth say that the scientific boys are beyond the prayer line by reason of their pursuits.

RUSSIAN Jews who reached Boston on the 29th ult. by the steamer Norseman, tell piteous stories of cruelties. A lad from Slabotky says that the Jews of that town were ordered to forsake their houses and leave the village in three days. They burnt their property rather than leave it for their persecutors. The Russians were enraged at this, and assaulted the Jews. One they hung to a telegraph pole by his hands. All families who had burnt their houses were sentenced to Siberia. The lad and his father and brother were thus sentenced, but he slipped his handcuffs. Other refugees at Boston say that any Russian Christian who covets the property of a Jew can obtain it by paying one-tenth of its value to the mayor or government representativ, who will giv him authority to expel the owner and take possession. It is an ordinary occurrence for a Jew's house to be burnt over his head or a Jew to be stoned on the streets, and it has become a common saying in parts of Russia, "Kill a Jew and pay twenty roubles," $10. No other punishment is ever inflicted for the murder of a Jew, and even this fine is seldom imposed.

Gems of Thought.

TIME pulls down error, but establishes truth.—Cuvier.

IF all the convicts in all the penitentiaries of the United States could be transported to some island in the sea, and there allowed to make a government for themselvs, they would pass better laws than John Calvin did in Geneva.—Ingersoll.

THE usage of those who cite vicious authorities, for worse purposes, and enforce the most absurd practice by the oldest precedent, is to bequeath to us as an heir-loom the errors of our forefathers; to confer a kind of immortality on folly, making the dead more powerful than time, and more sagacious than experience, by subjecting those that are upon the earth to the perpetual malgovernment of those that are beneath it.—Colton.

FORCE can be neither created nor destroyed—a proposition from which follows the indestructibility of force and the impossibility of its having as such either a beginning or an end. The result deduced from this newly discovered physical truth is the same as that deduced from the indestructibility of matter; the twain hav built up from eternity and will build up for evermore that totality of phenomena which we call the universe.—Buchner.

WE should found Sunday gardens, where our toil-worn fellow-citizens could enjoy their holidays with out-door sports, and out-door dances, free museums, temperance drinks, healthy refreshments, collections of botanical and zoological curiosities. Country excursions on the only leisure day of the laboring classes should be as free as air and sunshine, and every civilized community should hav a Recreation League for the promotion of that purpose.—Oswald.

MARRIAGE ought to be a civil contract; and on the parties going before a magistrate, in the presence of witnesses, and entering into an engagement, they should be considered as man and wife. This is what I caused to be done in France. If they wished it, they might go to the church afterward to get a priest to repeat the ceremony; but this ought not to be considered as indispensable. It was always my maxim that these religious ceremonies should never be above the laws, never take the lead or upper hand.—Napoleon Bonaparte.

THE [Bible] writer meant that God created the universe out of nothing; that at his word of command the "matter and force," or the something of which the "heavens and the earth" were composed, were called into being. By a knowledge of chemistry, electricity, and the physical sciences generally, we now learn, however, that matter and force are alike indestructible; that not one atom of them can be destroyed; that, manifold as are the changes through which it is possible for them to pass, not a particle is ever lost; and, being imperishable, it is rational to suppose that they never began to be.—Arthur B. Moss.

MONTESQUIEU says, that the Scythians put out the eyes of their slaves, that they might be more attentiv to the making of their butter. It is thus that the Inquisition acts, and almost everyone is blinded in the countries in which this monster reigns. In England people hav had two eyes for more than a hundred years. The French are beginning to open one eye—but sometimes men in place will not even permit us to be one-eyed. Those miserable statesmen are like Doctor Balouard of the Italian comedy, who will only be served by the tool Arlequin, and who fears to hav too penetrating a servant.—Voltaire.

WHENEVER a community or a powerful section of a community, or a government of any kind, attempts to dictate to the artist what he is to do, art either entirely vanishes, or becomes stereotyped, or degenerates into a low and ignoble form of craft. A work of art is the unique result of a unique temperament. Its beauty comes from the fact that the author is what he is. It has nothing to do with the fact that other people want what they want. Indeed, the moment that an artist takes notice of what other people want, and tries to supply the demand, he ceases to be an artist, and becomes a dull or an amusing craftsman, an honest or a dishonest tradesman. He has no further claim to be considered as an artist. Art is the most intense mode of Individualism that the world has known.—Oscar Wilde.

THE acceptance of the evolutionary philosophy is the profoundest mental revolution conceivable. It inverts the whole picture of life; or rather, to speak more accurately, it opens our eyes to the fact that the whole picture has been hitherto presented topsy-turvy. The fable of a fancied fall is replaced with the proof of a continuous ascent; for the pessimistic caricature of man as a degraded creature, conceived in sin, there is substituted a figure glowing with life and hope; an individuality with a matchless record of triumphs over hostil environments; a being preëminently capable of selecting from and absorbing all that is best in his environment; a being therefore essentially fitted for self-government. This is unquestionably the teaching of evolution; this is the ideal it holds up as that which alone is worthy of the dignity of man.—W. Owen.

From Behind the Bars. A series of letters written in prison. Over 700 pages. Price $1.50.

A Truth Seeker in Europe. A series of letters written during a visit of ten weeks in Europe. Giving some account of the International Freethinkers' Congress held at Brussels, to which Mr. Bennett was a delegate, followed by a description of what he saw in England, France, Holland, and Italy. The letters from Rome alone are worth the price of the book. With a steel-plate portrait of the author. 850 pages. $1.50.

The Semitic Gods and the Bible. Treating upon the gods of the Semitic nations, including Allah, Jehovah, Satan, the Holy Ghost, Jesus Christ, the Virgin Mary, and the Bible. To the latter 230 pages are devoted, showing that book to be a very inferior production for a first-class God. 333 large pages. Paper covers, 60 cents; cloth, $1.

Judaism, Christianity, and Mohammedanism examined historically and critically. It is thought to be the most damaging exhibit of Christianity that has appeared. 500 large pages. Price, $1.50.

The Humphrey-Bennett Discussion. A debate on Christianity and Infidelity, between D. M. BENNETT and Rev. G. H. HUMPHREY. This book has had a very large sale, and is a splendid work for Freethinkers to loan to Christian neighbors. 550 pages. Price, $1.

Bennett-Teed Discussion. Between D. M. BENNETT and CYRUS ROMULUS R. TEED. Jesus the Lord God Creator of Heaven and Earth. Paper, 30 cents;

What Objections to Christianity? A discussion between D. M. BENNETT and G. M. MAIR, divided into the following theses: 1. Christianity is neither new nor original, being borrowed or copied from much older systems of religion.

2. Miracles and supernatural achievements hav been as fully and truly ascribed to other teachers and founders of religion as to Jesus.

3. The story of Jesus and his mission in the world is unhistorical; it is not corroborated by contemporaneous history.

BENNETT affirms; MAIR denies. This is an exhaustiv discussion. Price, $1.50.

A LESSON FROM SHAKSPERE—WHAT UNCLE SAM WILL SOME DAY SAY TO PRIESTCRAFT.

UNCLE SAM AS GRATIANO: Beg that thou mayest hav leave to hang thyself: and yet thy wealth being forfeit to the state, thou hast not left the value of a cord, therefore, thou must be hanged at the state's charge! PRIESTCRAFT AS SHYLOCK: I pray you giv me leave to go from hence; I am not well!

THE argument of the Abbé Vigoroux, of Paris, against the doctrin of evolution, says the World, is rather more vigorous than conclusiv. But it will arouse the antagonism of the Darwinians of two worlds, for the abbé is a prominent churchman and worth tilting against.

THE London Times investigator who thinks deportation of the negro necessary, givs as reasons: "That the problem of the future of the colored race at the South is not tending toward a satisfactory solution, but is becoming more refractory and threatening continually; that such experience as has been had warrants the belief that the Southern whites will never permit the negro to enjoy the franchise or any degree of social equality; that in fact a race antagonism has been developing ever since the abolition of slavery; that the relations between the races are becoming more and more strained; that crimes and abuses are shockingly frequent on both sides; that the advance of the negro toward material prosperity has been discouragingly slow; that the same may be said of his growth in intelligence; that the North shares with the South that race prejudice which renders assimilation an idle dream; and that there is no ground for thinking that these conditions will change for the better."

MORGAN, commissioner of Indian schools, has written to Father Chappelle, vice-president of the Catholic missions bureau: "The schools maintained by the government for the education of the Indians should be strictly non-sectarian and non-partisan; and, further, the appropriation of public funds to sectarian institutions is, in my opinion, contrary to the spirit if not the letter of the Constitution, and opposed to public policy. My position on the question was violently assailed by your bureau. False charges were preferred against me, and the most determined but futil efforts were made to prevent my confirmation and to secure my displacement. An employee I discharged for cause from this office immediately got employment with your bureau, where he is still retained, and during the entire two years the bureau has both directly and indirectly, in season and out of season, publicly and privately, through newspapers and personal interviews, through official correspondence and in the lobby of Congress, assailed the policy of the administration, and attempted to defeat the extension and successful operation of the government schools."

"EVERY monastery and convent," wails the Catholic Freeman's Journal, "with its sacred traditions and its shrine, is a stronghold of the faith and a beacon of light. Of these there were until recent years many thousands in Italy. There was hardly a village, a valley or a hill without its convent and turret. Night and day was the incense of prayer ascending from innumerable choirs, bringing blessings to the church and peace to men of good will. But the Atheistic revolution has done its work thoroughly and without remorse, and is still activ with its mission of extermination. The great abbeys and ancient convents, once the glory and joy of the land, are all stripped of their possessions. The more notable ones hav been converted into government offices, municipal buildings or public institutions. The inmates received scant pity from their plunderers, and were in many cases sent adrift from their sacred sanctuaries and beloved homes where they had spent oft-times fifty and sixty years, with no other resources than a miserable pension of one or two francs a day, irregularly paid, sometimes diminished on some trivial pretext and at other times altogether withheld."

AMONG the inhabitants of Elisabetgrad, Russia, are many Jews who are engaged in the usual vocations of the people of that nationality in Russian cities. The intense hatred of the Jews entertained by the peasant population recently broke out, and several thousand farm laborers, small land-holders, and others engaged in agricultural occupations in the country surrounding Elisabetgrad, marched into the town and proceeded to the Jewish quarter. The Jews upon seeing the mob approaching made frantic efforts to hide themselvs. Amid cries of "Kill the Jews" the peasants descended upon their victims. They attacked the Jewish shops and dwellings and plundered them of everything valuable. What was considered not worth stealing was wantonly destroyed. Some of the braver Jews resisted this looting of their property, but this only made matters the worse for them, and three of them were killed. Many others, who attempted to defend their families or property from the mob, were severely wounded. The rioting in the Jewish quarter continued for hours, and although the authorities were well aware of the outrages they did not take a step to prevent them, nor in any way interfere to protect the Jews.

A DISPATCH from the shrine of St. Anne de Beaupre to the World reads: "Five trains and three steamers were required to take the pilgrims from Quebec down to the shrine to-day. Not only the church, but the entire village was in holiday attire. Papal and Canadian flags hung over the main entrance of the church. There was a grand solemn translation of a new relic of the saint, obtained for the shrine from Carcasson, France, by Cardinal Taschereau. It is the bone of a complete finger-joint of St. Anne. The former relic of St. Anne, in possession of the church, is only a portion of a finger-joint, and much smaller than the new one. Father Riley, being asked if miracles similar to those reported at St. Anne are worked anywhere else in America, said: 'Not to the same extent, and none that are so well known. Some hav been reported at the Passionist monastery at Hoboken, N. J., and others at the church of Our Lady of the Perpetual Help at Roxbury, where Miss Grace Hanley, now a nun in a Quebec convent, was cured of a serious spinal trouble. Nowhere else in America hav such miracles been reported.' There was a distressing amount of bodily pain and suffering in the mass of struggling humanity that knelt in prayer with St. Anne to-day. But the majority of the petitioners received no benefit. Many who had to be carried into the church were carried out again with their condition apparently unchanged. Hundreds of Americans are among the number."

When Did Jehoshaphat Die?

A BIBLE LESSON.

At the end of Solomon's reign the Jewish nation was divided into two kingdoms. Two tribes acknowledged the authority of Solomon's successor, Rehoboam. This was called the kingdom of Judah, of which Jerusalem was the capital. Ten tribes revolted and made Jeroboam king. This formed the kingdom of Israel, of which Samaria was the capital. The following is a brief summary of the reigns of the kings of the two kingdoms from the partition of the empire to the conquest of Israel by the Assyrians:

KINGDOM OF JUDAH.

"And Rehoboam the son of Solomon reigned in Judah . . . and he reigned seventeen years" (1 Kings xiv, 21).

"And Rehoboam slept with his fathers . . . and Abijam his son reigned in his stead" (1 Kings xiv, 31). "Three years reigned he" (xv, 2).

"And Abijam slept with his fathers . . . and Asa his son reigned in his stead" (1 Kings xv, 8). "Forty and one years reigned he" (10).

"And Asa slept with his fathers . . . and Jehoshaphat his son reigned in his stead" (1 Kings xv, 24). "And he reigned twenty and five years in Jerusalem" (xxii, 42).

"And Jehoshaphat slept with his fathers . . . and Jehoram his son reigned in his stead" (1 Kings xxii, 50). "And he reigned eight years" (2 Kings viii, 17).

"And Joram [Jehoram] slept with his fathers . . . and Ahaziah reigned in his stead" (2 Kings viii, 24). "And he reigned one year" (26).

"And he [Ahaziah] fled to Megiddo and died there" (2 Kings ix, 27). "And when Athaliah the mother of Ahaziah saw that her son was dead she arose and destroyed all the seed royal. But Jehosheba took Joash the son of Ahaziah . . . and he was with her [his nurse] hid in the house of the Lord six years. And Athaliah did reign over the land" (xi, 1–3).

"They slew Athaliah" (2 Kings xi, 20). "And they brought down the king [Joash] from the house of the Lord. . . . And he sat on the throne of the kings" (19). "Forty years reigned he in Jerusalem" (xii, 1).

"His servants smote him [Joash] and he died, . . . and Amaziah his son reigned in his stead" (2 Kings xii, 21)—"and reigned twenty and nine years" (xiv, 2).

"They made a conspiracy against him [Amaziah] . . . and slew him" (2 Kings xiv, 19). "And all the people of Judah took Azariah . . . and made him king instead of his father, Amaziah" (21). "And he reigned two and fifty years" (xv, 2).

"So Azariah slept with his fathers . . . and Jotham his son reigned in his stead" (2 Kings xv, 7). "And he reigned sixteen years" (33).

"And Jotham slept with his fathers . . . and Ahaz his son reigned in his stead" (2 Kings xv, 38)—"and reigned sixteen years" (xvi, 2).

"And Ahaz slept with his fathers . . . and Hezekiah his son reigned in his stead" (2 Kings xvi, 20). "In the sixth year of Hezekiah . . . Samaria was taken" (xviii, 10).

From the division of the empire, then, to the conquest of Israel by the Assyrians, the reigns of Judah's kings were as follows: Rehoboam, seventeen years; Abijam, three years; Asa, forty-one years; Jehoshaphat, twenty-five years; Joram, eight years; Ahaziah, one year; Athaliah, six years; Joash, forty years; Amaziah, twenty-nine years; Azariah, fifty-two years; Jotham, sixteen years; Ahaz, sixteen years; Hezekiah, six years.

KINGDOM OF ISRAEL.

"They . . . made him [Jeroboam] king over all Israel" (1 Kings xii, 20). "And the days which Jeroboam reigned were two and twenty years" (xiv, 20).

"And he [Jeroboam] slept with his fathers and Nadab his son reigned in his stead" (1 Kings xiv, 20)—"and reigned over Israel two years" (xv, 25).

"And Baasha smote him [Nadab] . . . and reigned in his stead" (1 Kings xv, 27, 28)—"twenty and four years" (33).

"So Baasha slept with his fathers . . . and Elah his son reigned in his stead" (1 Kings xvi, 6)—"two years" (8).

"Zimri went in and smote him, and killed him [Elah] . . . and reigned in his stead" (1 Kings xvi, 10)—"seven days" (15).

"Wherefore all Israel made Omri . . . king over Israel" (1 Kings xvi, 16)—"to reign over Israel twelve years" (23).

"So Omri slept with his fathers . . . and Ahab his son reigned in his stead" (1 Kings xvi, 28)—"twenty and two years" (29).

"So Ahab slept with his fathers and Ahaziah his son reigned in his stead" (1 Kings, xxii, 40)—"and reigned two years over Israel" (51).

"So he [Ahaziah] died . . . and Jehoram [his brother] reigned in his stead" (2 Kings i, 17)—"and reigned twelve years" (iii, 1).

"I hav anointed thee [Jehu] king . . . over Israel" (2 Kings ix, 6). "And Jehu . . . smote Jehoram" (24). "And the time that Jehu reigned over Israel in Samaria was twenty and eight years" (x, 36).

"And Jehu slept with his fathers . . . and Jehoahaz his son reigned in his stead" (2 Kings x, 35)—"and reigned seventeen years" (xiii, 1).

"And Jehoahaz slept with his fathers . . . and Joash his son reigned in his stead" (2 Kings xiii, 9)—"and reigned sixteen years" (10).

"And Joash slept with his fathers and Jeroboam sat upon his throne" (2 Kings xiii, 13)—"and reigned forty and one years" (xiv, 23).

"And Jeroboam slept with his fathers . . . and Zachariah his son reigned in his stead" (2 Kings xiv, 29)—"six months" (xv, 8).

"And Shallum . . . slew him [Zachariah] and reigned in his stead" (2 Kings, xv, 10)—"a full month" (13).

"Menahem . . . slew him [Shallum] and reigned in his stead" (2 Kings, xv, 14)—"and reigned ten years" (17).

"And Menahem slept with his fathers and Pekahiah his son reigned in his stead" (2 Kings xv, 22)—"and reigned two years" (23).

"Pekah . . . killed him [Pekahiah] and reigned in his room" (2 Kings xv, 25)—"and reigned twenty years" (27).

"And Hoshea . . . slew him [Pekah] and reigned in his stead" (2 Kings xv, 30)—"nine years" (xvii, 1). "In the ninth year of Hoshea the king of Assyria took Samaria, and carried Israel away into Assyria" (6).

From the division of the empire to the conquest of Israel the reigns of Israel's kings, omitting Zimri's brief reign of seven days and calling the combined reigns of Zachariah and Shallum one year as computed by chronologists, were as follows: Jeroboam, twenty-two years; Nadab, two years; Baasha, twenty-four years; Elah, two years; Omri, twelve years; Ahab, twenty-two years; Ahaziah, two years; Jehoram, twelve years; Jehu, twenty-eight years; Jehoahaz, seventeen years; Joash, sixteen years; Jeroboam II., forty-one years; Zachariah and Shallum, one year; Menahem, ten years; Pekahiah, two years; Pekah, twenty years; Hoshea, nine years.

WHEN DID JEHOSHAPHAT DIE?

The foregoing epitome of Jewish history, gleaned from 1 and 2 Kings, is presented in order that the reader may the more readily understand the following solutions (based upon statements that appear in these books) to the question that forms the topic of this Bible lesson—When did Jehoshaphat die?

Jehoshaphat is represented as one of Judah's best and greatest kings. He did "that which was right in the eyes of the Lord." "The Lord was with Jehoshaphat." "And Jehoshaphat waxed great." "And he had riches and honor in abundance." He died at the age of sixty, after a reign of twenty-five years. Ahaziah, king of Israel, is represented as a very wicked king. "He did evil in the sight of the Lord." "For he served Baal, and worshiped him, and provoked to anger the Lord." Elijah prophesied his early death, which came after a brief reign of two years. The last chapter of the first book of Kings chronicles the reign and death of Judah's king, Jehoshaphat; the first chapter of the second book of Kings records the reign and death of Israel's king, Ahaziah. Now when did Jehoshaphat die? Did he die before or after Ahaziah died?

1. "And in the twentieth year of Jeroboam, king of Israel, reigned Asa over Judah" (1 Kings xv, 9).

As Jeroboam reigned twenty-two years, he reigned two years after Asa became king. From the commencement of Asa's reign, then, to the death of Ahaziah, the reigns of Israel's kings were as follows: Jeroboam 2 years, Nadab 2 years, Baasha 24 years, Elah 2 years, Omri 12 years, Ahab 22 years, and Ahaziah 2 years. 2 yrs. + 2 yrs. + 24 yrs. + 2 yrs. + 12 yrs. + 22 yrs. + 2 yrs. = 66 yrs.

As Asa reigned forty-one years and Jehoshaphat reigned twenty-five years, from the commencement of Asa's reign to the death of Jehoshaphat was 41 yrs. + 25 yrs. = 66 yrs.

If from the commencement of Asa's reign to the death of Ahaziah was sixty-six years, and from the commencement of Asa's reign to the death of Jehoshaphat was sixty-six years, Jehoshaphat therefore died in the same year that Ahaziah died.

2. "Now in the eighteenth year of King Jeroboam the son of Nebat reigned Abijam over Judah" (1 Kings xv, 1).

As Jeroboam reigned twenty-two years, he reigned four years after the beginning of Abijam's reign. From the beginning of Abijam's reign, then, to the death of Ahaziah, the reigns of Israel's kings were: Jeroboam 4 years, Nadab 2 years, Baasha 24 years, Elah 2 years, Omri 12 years, Ahab 22 years, and Ahaziah 2 years. 4 yrs. + 2 yrs. + 24 yrs. + 2 yrs. + 12 yrs. + 22 yrs. + 2 yrs. = 68 yrs.

From the beginning of Abijam's reign to the death of Jehoshaphat the reigns of Judah's kings were: Abijam 3 years, Asa 41 years, Jehoshaphat 25 years. 3 yrs. + 41 yrs. + 25 yrs. = 69 yrs.

If from the beginning of Abijam's reign to the death of Ahaziah was sixty-eight years, and from the beginning of Abijam's reign to the death of Jehoshaphat was sixty-nine years, Jehoshaphat therefore died one year after Ahaziah died.

3. "In the thirty and first year of Asa king of Judah began Omri to reign over Israel" (1 Kings xvi, 23).

From the accession of Omri to the death of Ahaziah the reigns of Israel's kings were: Omri 12 years, Ahab 22 years, and Ahaziah 2 years. 12 yrs. + 22 yrs. + 2 yrs. = 36 yrs.

As Omri became king in the thirty-first year of Asa's reign, Asa reigned ten years after Omri became king, and this added to Jehoshaphat's reign of twenty-five years makes thirty-five years from Omri to the death of Jehoshaphat.

If from the accession of Omri to the death of Ahaziah was thirty-six years, and from the accession of Omri to the death of Jehoshaphat was thirty-five years, Jehoshaphat therefore died one year before Ahaziah died.

4. "In the three and twentieth year of Joash the son of Ahaziah king of Judah, Jehoahaz the son of Jehu began to reign over Israel" (2 Kings xiii, 1).

From the death of Ahaziah, king of Israel, to the accession of Jehoahaz, Jehoram reigned 12 years, and Jehu 28 years, a total of 40 years.

From the death of Jehoshaphat to the accession of Jehoahaz, Judah's sovereigns reigned—Joram 8 years, Ahaziah 1 year, Athaliah 6 years, Joash 23 years. 8 yrs. + 1 yr. + 6 yrs. + 23 yrs. = 38 yrs.

If from the death of Ahaziah to the accession of Jehoahaz was forty years, and from the death of Jehoshaphat to the accession of Jehoahaz was thirty-eight years, Jehoshaphat therefore died two years after Ahaziah died.

5. "And Jehoram [of Israel] reigned in his [Ahaziah's] stead, in the second year of Jehoram the son of Jehoshaphat" (2 Kings i, 17).

If Ahaziah died and Jehoram of Israel became king in the second year of Jehoram of Judah, Jehoshaphat therefore died two years before Ahaziah died.

6. "And Joram [Jehoram] king of Israel and Ahaziah king of Judah went out, each in his chariot, . . . against Jehu" (2 Kings ix, 21). "And Jehu drew a bow with his full strength, and smote Jehoram between his arms, and the arrow went out at his heart" (24). "But when Ahaziah the king of Judah saw this, he fled by way of the garden house. And Jehu followed after him, and said, Smite him also in the chariot. And they did so" (27).

Jehoram, king of Israel, and Ahaziah, king of Judah, were thus slain at the same time. Jehu succeeded Jehoram; Athaliah succeeded Ahaziah, reigned six years, and was in turn succeeded by Joash. Jehu had thus reigned six years over Israel when Joash became king of Judah. As Jehoram reigned twelve years, from the death of Ahaziah [of Israel] to the accession of Joash, then, was eighteen years.

From the death of Jehoshaphat to the accession of Joash, Judah's sovereigns reigned as follows: Joram 8 years, Ahaziah 1 year, Athaliah 6 years—a total of 15 years.

If from the death of Ahaziah to the reign of Joash was eighteen years, and from the death of Jehoshaphat to the reign of Joash was fifteen years, Jehoshaphat therefore died three years after Ahaziah died.

7. "In the second year of Joash son of Jehoahaz king of Israel reigned Amaziah the son of Joash king of Judah" (2 Kings xiv, 1).

From the death of Ahaziah to the accession of Amaziah the reigns of Israel's kings were—Jehoram 12 years, Jehu 28 years, Jehoahaz 17 years, Joash 2 years. 12 yrs. + 28 yrs. + 17 yrs. + 2 yrs. = 59 yrs.

From the death of Jehoshaphat to the accession of Amaziah, Judah's kings reigned—Joram 8 years, Ahaziah 1 year, Athaliah 6 years, Joash 40 years. 8 yrs. + 1 yr. + 6 yrs. + 40 yrs. = 55 yrs.

If from the death of Ahaziah to the accession of Amaziah was fifty-nine years, and from the death of Jehoshaphat to the accession of Amaziah was fifty-five years, Jehoshaphat therefore died four years after Ahaziah died.

8. "And Jehoshaphat the son of Asa began to reign over Judah in the fourth year of Ahab king of Israel" (1 Kings xxii, 41).

If Ahab reigned twenty-two years and Jehoshaphat began to reign in the fourth year of Ahab's reign, Jehoshaphat had reigned eighteen years when Ahab died, and twenty years when Ahaziah died. As Jehoshaphat reigned twenty-five years, he therefore died five years after Ahaziah died.

9. "Ahaziah the son of Ahab began to reign over Israel in Samaria the seventeenth year of Jehoshaphat king of Judah, and reigned two years over Israel" (1 Kings xxii, 51).

If Ahaziah began to reign in the seventeenth year of Jehoshaphat and reigned two years before he died, he died in the nineteenth year of Jehoshaphat's reign. As Jehoshaphat reigned twenty-five years, he therefore died six years after Ahaziah died.

10. "Now Jehoram the son of Ahab began to reign over Israel in Samaria in the eighteenth year of Jehoshaphat king of Judah" (2 Kings iii, 1).

If Ahaziah died and Jehoram became king in the eighteenth year of Jehoshaphat's reign, Jehoshaphat therefore died seven years after Ahaziah died.

11. "In the second year of Pekah the son of Remaliah king of Israel began Jotham the son of Uzziah [Azariah] king of Judah to reign" (2 Kings xv, 32).

From the death of Ahaziah to the beginning of Jotham's reign, the following were the reigns of Israel's kings: Jehoram 12 years, Jehu 28 years, Jehoahaz 17 years, Joash 16 years, Jeroboam 41 years, Zachariah and Shallum 1 year, Menahem 10 years, Pekahiah 2 years, Pekah 2 years. 12 yrs. + 28 yrs. + 17 yrs. + 16 yrs. + 41 yrs. + 1 yr. + 10 yrs. + 2 yrs. + 2 yrs. = 129 yrs.

From the death of Jehoshaphat to the beginning of Jotham's reign the following were the reigns of Judah's kings: Joram 8 years, Ahaziah 1 year, Athaliah 6 years, Joash 40 years, Amaziah 29 years, Azariah 52 years. 8 yrs. + 1 yr. + 6 yrs. + 40 yrs. + 29 yrs. + 52 yrs. = 136 yrs.

If from the death of Ahaziah to the beginning of Jotham's reign was one hundred and twenty-nine years, and from the death of Jehoshaphat to the beginning of Jotham's reign was one hundred and thirty-six years, Jehoshaphat therefore died seven years before Ahaziah died.

12. "In the thirty and eighth year of Azariah king of Judah did Zachariah the son of Jeroboam reign over Israel" (2 Kings xv, 8).

From the death of Ahaziah to the accession of Zachariah the reigns of Israel's kings were: Jehoram 12 years, Jehu 28 years, Jehoahaz 17 years, Joash 16 years, Jeroboam 41 years. 12 yrs. + 28 yrs. + 17 yrs. + 16 yrs. + 41 yrs. = 114 yrs.

From the death of Jehoshaphat to the accession of Zachariah the reigns of Judah's kings were: Joram 8 years, Ahaziah 1 year, Athaliah 6 years, Joash 40 years, Amaziah 29 years, Azariah 38 years. 8 yrs. + 1 yr. + 6 yrs. + 40 yrs. + 29 yrs. + 38 yrs. = 122 yrs.

If from the death of Ahaziah to the accession of Zachariah was one hundred and fourteen years, and from the death of Jehoshaphat to the accession of Zachariah was one hundred and twenty-two years, Jehoshaphat therefore died eight years before Ahaziah died.

13. "In the fiftieth year of Azariah king of Judah, Pekahiah the son of Menahem began to reign over Israel" (2 Kings xv, 23).

From the death of Ahaziah to the accession of Pekahiah, Israel's kings reigned as follows: Jehoram 12 years, Jehu 28 years, Jehoahaz 17 years, Joash 16 years, Jeroboam 41 years, Zachariah and Shallum 1 year, Menahem 10 years. 12 yrs. + 28 yrs. + 17 yrs. + 16 yrs. + 41 yrs. + 1 yr. + 10 yrs. = 125 yrs.

From the death of Jehoshaphat to the accession of Pekahiah, Judah's kings reigned as follows: Joram 8 years, Ahaziah 1 year, Athaliah 6 years, Joash 40 years, Amaziah 29 years, Azariah 50 years. 8 yrs. + 1 yr. + 6 yrs. + 40 yrs. + 29 yrs. + 50 yrs. = 134 yrs.

If from the death of Ahaziah to the accession of Pekahiah was one hundred and twenty-five years, and from the death of Jehoshaphat to the accession of Pekahiah was one hundred and thirty-four years, Jehoshaphat therefore died nine years before Ahaziah died.

14. "In the twelfth year of Ahaz king of Judah began Hoshea the son of Elah to reign in Samaria over Israel" (2 Kings xvii, 1).

From the death of Ahaziah to the accession of Hoshea the reigns of Israel's kings were: Jehoram 12 years, Jehu 28 years, Jehoahaz 17 years, Joash 16 years, Jeroboam 41 years, Zachariah and Shallum 1 year, Menahem 10 years, Pekahiah 2 years, Pekah 20 years. 12 yrs. + 28 yrs. + 17 yrs. + 16 yrs. + 41 yrs. + 1 yr. + 10 yrs. + 2 yrs. + 20 yrs. = 147 yrs.

From the death of Jehoshaphat to the accession of Hoshea the reigns of Judah's kings were: Joram 8 years, Ahaziah 1 year, Athaliah 6 years, Joash 40 years, Amaziah 29 years, Azariah 52 years, Jotham 16 years, Ahaz 12 years. 8 yrs. + 1 yr. + 6 yrs. + 40 yrs. + 29 yrs. + 52 yrs. + 16 yrs. + 12 yrs. = 164 yrs.

If from the death of Ahaziah to the accession of Hoshea was one hundred and forty-seven years, and from the death of Jehoshaphat to the accession of Hoshea was one hundred and sixty-four years, Jehoshaphat therefore died seventeen years before Ahaziah died.

15. "And it came to pass in the fourth year of King Hezekiah, which was the seventh year of Hoshea son of Elah king of Israel, that Shalmaneser king of Assyria came up against Samaria and besieged it" (2 Kings xviii, 9).

From the death of Ahaziah to the commencement of the siege of Samaria the reigns of Israel's kings were: Jehoram 12 years, Jehu 28 years, Jehoahaz 17 years, Joash 16 years, Jeroboam 41 years, Zachariah and Shallum 1 year, Menahem 10 years, Pekahiah 2 years, Pekah 20 years, Hoshea 7 years. 12 yrs. + 28 yrs. + 17 yrs. + 16 yrs. + 41 yrs. + 1 yr. + 10 yrs. + 2 yrs. + 20 yrs. + 7 yrs. = 154 yrs.

From the death of Jehoshaphat to the siege of Samaria the reigns of Judah's kings were: Joram 8 years, Ahaziah 1 year, Athaliah 6 years, Joash 40 years, Amaziah 29 years, Azariah 52 years, Jotham 16 years, Ahaz 16 years, Hezekiah 4 years. 8 yrs. + 1 yr. + 6 yrs. + 40 yrs. + 29 yrs. + 52 yrs. + 16 yrs. + 16 yrs. + 4 yrs. = 172 yrs.

If from the death of Ahaziah to the siege of Samaria was one hundred and fifty-four years, and from the death of Jehoshaphat to the siege of Samaria was one hundred and seventy-two years, Jehoshaphat therefore died eighteen years before Ahaziah died.

16. "In the twenty and seventh year of Jeroboam king of Israel began Azariah son of Amaziah king of Judah to reign" (2 Kings xv, 1).

From the death of Ahaziah to the accession of Azariah the reigns of Israel's kings were: Jehoram 12 years, Jehu 28 years, Jehoahaz 17 years, Joash 16 years, Jeroboam 27 years. 12 yrs. + 28 yrs. + 17 yrs. + 16 yrs. + 27 yrs. = 100 yrs.

From the death of Jehoshaphat to the accession of Azariah the reigns of Judah's kings were: Joram 8 years, Ahaziah 1 year, Athaliah 6 years, Joash 40 years, Amaziah 29 years. 8 yrs. + 1 yr. + 6 yrs. + 40 yrs. + 29 yrs. = 84 years.

If from the death of Ahaziah to the accession of Azariah was one hundred years, and from the death of Jehoshaphat to the accession of Azariah was eighty-four years, Jehoshaphat therefore died sixteen years after Ahaziah died.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS.

When did Jehoshaphat's death occur? Did it occur before or after Ahaziah's death occurred? The following are the various answers to this question which the preceding solutions hav disclosed:

1. The same year; 2. One year after; 3. One year before; 4. Two years after; 5. Two years before; 6. Three years after; 7. Four years after; 8. Five years after; 9. Six years after; 10. Seven years after; 11. Seven years before; 12. Eight years before; 13. Nine years before; 14. Seventeen years before; 15. Eighteen years before; 16. Sixteen years after.

Here are sixteen different answers to a simple historical question. But one of them can possibly be correct; fifteen of them must necessarily be incorrect. And yet I challenge the theologian to demonstrate the incorrectness of one of them without at the same time demonstrating the fallibility of the Bible and its unreliability as a historical record.

NOTES AND EXPLANATIONS.

The history of Judah's and of Israel's sovereigns is recorded in Kings and repeated in Chronicles. Had I used both Kings and Chronicles in the preparation of this lesson, the number of various answers would hav been increased. Some Christian scholars, however, admit that Chronicles is not entirely free from errors, while Kings, on the other hand, is denominated a "marvel of accuracy." To avoid any objections that might be raised were Chronicles used—to assail only that which is deemed unassailable—I hav confined myself to Kings.

To prevent confusion in regard to names, the reader should remember that Israel had two kings named Jeroboam, and that Israel and Judah each had kings named Ahaziah, Jehoram, and Jehoash. In Israel Jehoram succeeded Ahaziah; in Judah, Ahaziah succeeded Jehoram. The contracted form of Jehoram is Joram, and of Jehoash, Joash. Both forms are used. Azariah is also called Uzziah.

In computing time, ordinal numbers are reckoned the same as cardinal numbers. It may be urged that the phrase, "in the eighteenth year," does not denote the full period of eighteen completed years. In justification of the method pursued, I may say that it is not only the method generally followed by chronologists, but it is the method authorized by the Bible. See 2 Kings xvii, 1; 2 Kings xvii, 6. Also 1 Kings xv, 9, 10; 2 Chron. xvi, 13. Its adoption simplifies the form without increasing the number of solutions.

To reconcile other discrepancies, some Bible chronologists hav assumed an interregnum of eleven years between the reigns of Jeroboam II. and Zachariah, and another of nine years between Pekah and Hosea. The language of the Bible utterly precludes these assumptions.

"And Jeroboam slept with his fathers, even with the kings of Israel; and Zachariah his son reigned in his stead" (2 Kings xiv, 29).

"And Hoshea the son of Elah made a conspiracy against Pekah the son of Remaliah, and smote him, and slew him, and reigned in his stead" (2 Kings xv, 30).

That these interregnums did not occur, nor indeed any interregnums between the reigns of Israel's kings, is attested by Josephus, who by Christians is esteemed an authority second only to the writers of the scriptures. The ninth book of his "Antiquities" bears the following title: "Containing the interval of one hundred and fifty-seven years—from the death of Ahab to the captivity of the ten tribes." This forbids the idea of any interregnum.

But if it could be shown that these or other interregnums really did occur, the fact would increase rather than diminish the difficulties connected with the solution of this question.

We search the writings of Bible commentators in vain for an explanation or attempted reconciliation of many of the conflicting statements to be found in the passages that I hav quoted. These exegetes hav either been ignorant of their existence, or hav purposely ignored them. Some of the more noticeable ones they hav attempted to reconcile; but the explanations offered are of such a character as to make it seemingly impossible for an honest scholar to advance them, or an intelligent reader to accept them.

These pretended reconciliations hav been abridged, and, in the shape of marginal notes, transferred to the popular editions of the Bible. Where different and conflicting dates are assigned for the commencement of a king's reign, opposit the first will be found such explanatory notes as "prorex," "viceroy," "in consort" or "in partnership with his father;" and opposit the last, "began to reign alone;" and all this without a word or hint, either in the Bible, or elsewhere, to authorize it.

Supposing that in a popular history of the United States it is stated that James Buchanan became president in 1857, and served four years; and that in the succeeding chapter it is stated that Abraham Lincoln became president in 1859, served four years, and was assassinated. Here is a palpable discrepancy. But imagin the enterprising publisher attempting in a footnote to explain away this discrepancy by gravely declaring that Lincoln was associated with Buchanan in the presidency two years before he became president himself. Such a performance is not more dishonest and foolish than these efforts of the advocates of the infallibility of the Bible to explain away the many gross discrepancies that mar its pages.

The existence of the above-mentioned error precludes the recognition of this history as a perfectly reliable and infallible record. Yet in spite of this one error it may be a worthy and valuable work. But if it can be shown that it contains a dozen mistakes of the same character, in addition to innumerable other defects, it deserves to be discarded as an authority. The demonstration of a single error in the Bible destroys the dogmas of its divinity and infallibility. Yet notwithstanding thie single error, or even twenty errors, it might still be valuable as a historical record. But when it can be demonstrated that it abounds with glaring contradictions, that its every chapter teems with flagrant errors, it is utterly unworthy of credit, and must be rejected even as a human record of events. How to Help The Truth Seeker.

1. When renewing get a friend to subscribe and thus save a half dollar apiece.
2. Get your newsdealer to display it on his stand or in his shop window. Be sure that he displays the pictures.
3. Get your newsdealer to keep in stock one or more copies, with your guarantee to take off his hands at the end of the week any that remain unsold. If he exhibits them the pictures alone will sell them.
4. Take a few extra copies and circulate them among your acquaintances. On your request, we will send you back-number sample copies free.
5. Leave a copy occasionally where it will be picked up—in the train, in the factory, in the meeting-room, in the cigar store, in the barber-shop. Leave it picture-side up.
6. Keep in your pocket some of our cheap tracts, and when convenient hand one to a friend.
7. Get a new subscriber by persuading some friend to take it.

THE industrial spirit which became prominent early in the fourteenth century produced [a religious change]. It did so in three ways. It arose in a society in which the laity were crouching in abject submission to the priesthood, and it developed and raised to honor the practice of money-lending, which the priesthood had invariably anathematized. It arose in a society in which the duty of religious intolerance was regarded as an axiom, and it produced a tendency toward toleration by uniting men of different creeds in amicable intercourse, by elevating to honor on account of their commercial merits the people who were most persecuted on account of their creed, by making men concentrate their attention mainly on practice rather than on theory, and by calling into existence an order of interests which persecution seriously endangered. It, in the last place, made men look with aversion upon the monastic ideal which was the very center of the prevailing theology. In all these ways it proved the precursor of the Reformation, and in all these ways it harmonized with the spirit of Rationalism.—Lecky.

Cigar Money for the Secular Penny Fund.

The Secular Penny movement still widens its circles. One enthusiastic upholder of the movement, residing in New York state, sends us $1 39, being "one cent for each and every inhabitant in the school-district" where he resides. A California lady writes:

A gentleman gave me fifty cents to send to the Pence Fund, one penny for himself, and forty-nine for ministers who he was sure would not giv any. Another had a good laugh over it, and gave me twenty-five cents; another, a dime; I make it $1 and inclose.

And now our friends are writing to suggest that some of the dimes which daily go up in Liberal tobacco-smoke might, with propriety, be turned into the American Secular Union Penny Fund instead. One Liberal, seventy years of age, sends us eight cents in stamps, and says:

Too bad the war times small scrip has passed away. There is not a Liberal smoker in the United States that would not mail you a five or ten cent scrip to assist keeping at the antipodes church and state. Will it be possible to use or sell postage stamps?

To this we reply, Yes, we can use all the stamps sent us, although we should, of course, prefer money-orders, etc., where larger amounts than a few cents are mailed us. In sending stamps, please do not send larger denominations than the two-cent kind.

One of the "old guard" of Radicals, an old-time lecturer and worker in the vineyard of Liberalism, sends us the following brief article, requesting us to forward it to THE TRUTH SEEKER and other Liberal papers:

FIVE CENTS TO THE AMERICAN SECULAR UNION.

After fifty years of persecution and warfare in defense of truth, I am now an invalid and beggar; but I will giv five cents to support the American Secular Union, and now send it. The very poorest who read this can send as much as this, and I hope all will do so. If you hav not five cents' worth of truth and humanity, then do not call yourself a Liberal or Freethinker. Many of you use five cents' worth of tobacco every day. Only a few can giv $100, $50, $25, or $10; many can giv $1; and all the others can giv five cents now and then, if they will. If ten thousand will giv five cents at once, it will add $500 to the American Secular Union treasury.

I suppose a large proportion of the contributions to support Catholic and Protestant institutions come from the laborers and servants in nickels, dimes, and quarters. If all who believe in truth, justice, and equal freedom will giv even five cents, it will help much, and will inspire all who are trying to keep church and state separate, as Washington, Paine, and Grant so much desired.

J. H. COOK.

Now, gentlemen, I know that we touch a sensitiv spot when we suggest that a smoker can find a better use for his nickels than spending them for tobacco. I know how wedded the most of you are to the dear delights of its noxious fumes, and how you resent the gentlest and most sweetly-worded protest a woman can make regarding it from a hygienic and an esthetic standpoint, not to talk about the money it costs. Nevertheless, since the two gentlemen quoted above hav made the appeal through me for contributions of cigar money, I gladly second the motion, and I earnestly hope that it will be carried by a rousing majority of the smokers who read these words. To deny yourselvs an occasional cigar is surely a small sacrifice to make for the Liberal cause. Yet, the nickel or the dime you send in means the sending out of a pamphlet to somebody who would otherwise hav to go without it. This little self-denial on your part—a self-denial which you will forget all about in a day or a week after—may make all the difference in the world between the darkness of superstition and the dawning of Universal Mental Liberty to some fellow-creature. Come, gentlemen, how many of you love state secularization well enough to sacrifice an occasional cigar at its shrine? IDA C. CRADDOCK,

Corr. Sec. American Secular Union.

St. Paul as a Teacher.

A great deal of the success of early Christianity may be justly attributed to the powerful advocacy of St. Paul. It must be remembered, however, that Paul never saw Jesus. True, he is alleged to hav seen him in a vision, but in these days visions are not accounted as of much value.

The story of Paul on his way to Damascus being smitten by a light from heaven, or in more modern language, by sunstroke, under the influence of which he imagined he saw Jesus, who exclaimed, "Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me?" is well known to every student of the Bible.

The New Testament contains few stories of more pathetic interest. Paul, who had been a great opponent of Christianity, is suddenly converted into an enthusiastic supporter by the effect of this light from heaven and strange vision. Being a scholarly man and a powerful advocate Paul soon succeeded in making numerous converts. Indeed, it is no exaggeration to say that he made more converts in a few years than all the chosen disciples of Jesus got together during their lives. The great doctrin of Paul was "Christ and him crucified."

He did not, however, believe in the physical resurrection of Jesus. His view was that a spiritual body of Jesus had arisen, and that it was as spiritual beings we should all rise again, when on the last day the Lord came to judge mankind for their actions on earth. "Flesh and blood" cannot inherit the kingdom of God, said Paul—and he went on to affirm that there were two kinds of bodies, one terrestrial and the other celestial, and with the latter we appeared in the world beyond the grave.

Constantly Paul reiterates the declaration that "if Christ were not risen then was their faith [Christianity] in vain."

That Paul's vision was of an entirely subjectiv character there can be but little doubt; for the narrativ makes clear to us that the disciples who were with Paul "stood speechless, hearing a voice but seeing no man," while Paul, who had himself fallen upon his face to the ground, "arose from the earth; and when his eyes were opened he saw no man; but they led him by the hand and brought him into Damascus" (Acts ix, 7, 8). On another occasion, speaking of a similar experience, Paul declared that he knew not "whether he was in the body or out of the body" (2 Cor. i, 4). Upon this point, therefore, I again affirm that Paul never really saw Jesus, and that the "appearance" which he imagins he saw was like one of Hamlet's visions of his dead father, "In my mind's eye, Horatio."

The life of Paul was an extremely interesting one. Born at Tarsus, about fourteen years after the birth of Jesus, he appears to hav begun life under very favorable circumstances. His parents belonged to the Jewish sect known as Pharisees and brought their son up strictly in accordance with their principles. To start with they gave him a good education. He was trained in a good school, and one of his principal teachers was the celebrated Rabbi Gamaliel. Paul also made himself familiar with the teachings of Plato (see Prof. Alexander Wilder on "Paul and Plato") and with many of the great Greek poets, and fitted himself by systematic study to become a real teacher as well as a popular leader of the people.

The parents of Paul, however, saw the necessity not only of having their son well educated, but of giving him a trade to fall back upon in case of need. Paul, we are informed, was instructed in the useful art of tent-making.

The description of the personal appearance of the great Christian advocate is thus given by Professor Allen: "Paul, then, according to the legends, was a man little of stature, under five feet high, they say, high-shouldered, beetle-browed, with head bent forward, his beard and hair at middle life of an iron-gray; his brow wide, his face thin, his eye deep and somewhat sad; the dark eye, the marked features, we may suppose of the strong Jewish type. His bodily presence was weak and his speech contemptible—so his enemies said. That his speech was hesitating and slow when not aroused we may believe easily enough. It was so with Demosthenes; it was so with Mohammed, who, next to Paul, has shown the most burning and effectiv eloquence of the Semitic race, and in whom, like Paul, that barrier of hesitation gave way on occasion to a hot flood of eager and passionate words that stirred great floods of popular conviction" (Christian History, vol. 1, quoted by Dr. Louis Janes in his Study of Primitiv Christianity).

Paul, like Jesus, was brought up by strictly orthodox parents, but having more than ordinary ability he was capable of thinking out the views to which his brain gave adherence; but notwithstanding a certain originality of thought and a strong desire for freedom for himself, he nevertheless manifested a fierce spirit of persecution toward those who had the courage to differ from him and who sought to giv expression to their views. We are not surprised to learn, therefore, that Paul at first was a most vigorous opponent of Christianity, nor that when he subsequently embraced it he displayed the same bigoted spirit, the same malevolence toward opponents, as he had formerly toward his Christian adversaries. At the time of Paul the Jews had become scattered over the various parts of the earth, and wheresoever they went they endeavored to win adherents to their faith. And it must be distinctly understood that for years after the death of Jesus Christianity was only a sort of "extended Judaism," preached and held by many Jews, and it was not until the heathen—Greek or Roman—was admitted into the community that any very grave or serious difficulties arose.

The Acts of the Apostles contain a description of this period, and show how Stephen, a leader of the new Christian school, was barbarously murdered by being stoned to death by an infuriated mob of orthodox Jewish Christians. Paul not only witnessed the martyrdom of Stephen but stood complacently by and sanctioned this religious murder with the smile of his approval.

Three years after his conversion to Christianity Paul began his career as a peregrinating missionary in the interests of the new faith. Everywhere Paul's labors were crowned with success.

He met with many obstacles, with many trials and troubles, but by dint of enthusiasm and steady effort he overcame them one by one. On two or three occasions he met Peter and James, but from neither of them did he receive much encouragement in the work he had undertaken; indeed, like most enthusiasts, Paul was left to carry on his labors alone, until success had crowned his efforts.

No doubt Peter distrusted Paul. He had known him when he was a strenuous opponent, and he was not likely to take kindly to him merely because he changed his views, for Peter found himself at variance with Paul on many important points respecting the rites and ordinances of Judaism as a preliminary to baptism. Paul, being the intellectual superior of Peter, defeated him at every turn.

Extending his missionary labors to Antioch, Ephesus, Athens, and even Rome itself, Paul made fresh converts day by day. A gulf between the orthodox Christians and the followers of Paul soon began to manifest itself, and this gulf widened considerably after his death. Of Paul's death nothing certain is known. All we know is that he was put upon his trial in Rome for stirring up public dissensions, but whether he ultimately suffered martyrdom or died a natural death there is no evidence to show. Of this, however, we may be certain, Paul played an important part in the propagation of a new phase of Christianity. He won hundreds of followers, who as zealously carried on the work after his death.

It is worthy of remark just here that the idea of Jesus as a divine being was as yet unknown. Paul certainly never considered Jesus in the light of a God; nor did his numerous Jewish followers. Indeed, when orthodox Christianity came to involve the dogma of the miraculous birth and supernatural character of Jesus the Jews opposed it and were ultimately excluded from the Christian fold.

According to the Acts of the Apostles Paul was a miracle-worker, and on one occasion raised a young man from the dead (Acts xx, 9–11).

He is also alleged to hav healed a cripple, and made him stand upright on his feet and leap and walk (Acts xiv, 9, 10).

No doubt the possession of this supposed power gave Paul additional power. All that was necessary on the part of the afflicted believer was to hav faith.

Yes, faith, and plenty of it, has proved sufficient in all ages of ignorance and credulity.

Intellectual cripples too often hav had no other support; and history affords us the amplest proof that priests hav never failed to take advantage of their knowledge of this fact. ARTHUR B. MOSS.

Prayer of the Unbeliever.

I.

An old man with shrunken features, long gray locks, dimmed eyes, emaciated form, and a face shrouded with melancholy, gazed through an open window into the depths of a starry night.

The mystery of interminable space overwhelmed his soul.

The incalculable distance of the shining points weighted him down with their immensity.

The universe, with its endless array of systems, its planetary grandeurs, its stupendous stellar amplitude, enveloped him and crushed him into the very dust of nothingness.

Even the planet on which he stood seemed, in comparison with the monstrous whole, an infinitesimal fragment of a leaf on which some human larvæ cling, and as minute, invisible, as unknown, in the entirety of creation as an atom of ether in remotest space.

He felt himself to be only an individual in the contemptible and microscopic infusoria of existence; one of a billion occupants of a tiny globule known as earth; a drop so insignificant in comparison with the mass of created things that it is no more to be distinguished, known, individualized, than a fleck of foam in the breakers of the isolated Antarctic.

The hugeness of his environment and the conception of his own obscurity and minuteness swept over him like a great flood, and he felt himself adrift, helpless, like some strangling swimmer.

In his wretchedness he prayed, and this was the prayer that he poured out in the starry night.

II.

I address thee as the Great Unknown. I do not even know that thou hast existence. I scarcely even hope that what I may utter may not be wasted, lost in this yawning, pitiless void—that my supplication may be addressed only to earless and sightless vacuity. I am, despite myself, an unbeliever. I can not believe that Jesus Christ was thy son. I can not believe that he died on the cross to placate thy anger, or to satisfy thy demands for vengeance. I cannot believe that he arose from the dead and ascended into heaven.

I cannot believe that in all the ages of humanity there has been uttered even one faint whisper which may be construed as evidence of a future life. I cannot believe that there is a single fact which permits the conclusion that man dies other than as the trees die, or that he livs again, save as the generations of vegetation which rise each from the grave of its ancestor. Thou art said to be ever-existent, omnipresent, omnipotent, and just. If thou art ever-existent, thou art of to day; if omnipresent, thou art here on this lonely mote wandering in space, to listen to my petition; if omnipotent thou canst, and if just thou wilt, grant it.

III.

Sad is the good-night which has no hope of a to-morrow.

Eternal seems the parting whose shadows obscure the light of life.

Penetrate its gloom with the auroral gray of dawn! Dissipate the approaching darkness whose twilight is flung upon me by the oppressiv night!

My soul has been a thousand times bathed in tears as I hav listened to the simple expression of faith in children. They believe without effort, hindrance, or hesitation. The grave has for them no terrors; they see beyond and above, where there are golden streets, and an existence joyous and eternal.

Oftentimes the tones of singers as they chant the beneficence of the father to his children, flood my eyes as there comes to me the conviction, I hav no father, no faith, no future! With swift but unwilling steps I am approaching a turbulent river.

I see already the funeral mists which float above it, and through which no further shore is visible. Even now I feel the cold and deadly chill of its waters; I feel myself in fancy borne away on its swift, relentless currents, to be voided into the limitless ocean of unconsciousness.

Impenetrable are the overhanging mists, sullen and despairing are the voices of the waters of this somber stream. Lift the rayless gloom incumbent on this sad river and permit me to see the "shining silver shore" beyond. Hav these impenetrable mists a boundary? Is there a sky in the distance full of blue and promis, beneath which they hav melted away and disappeared?

Is there far across this stream a region whence the shadows hav flown, and eternal sunshine vivifies the chilled and exhausted swimmer? Emerges one from the gloom into effulgent light, as the sleeper of the night suddenly wakens to the glories of a beautiful morning?

IV.

If thou art omniscient, thou knowest that I am torn with a deadly apprehension of a death which ends all or a future life of eternal pain. I would wish to believe that death is the dividing line between the mortal and the immortal; that the future givs rest; that there are in the beyond compensations for the sufferings, the failures of the present. I know that the desire for a life in the future and everlasting rest may be but an expression of timorous selfishness, such as impels the hunted animal to fly from the arrow of the pursuer; that the dread of the darkness of death may be only the unfounded fear of a child to penetrate the shadows of night.

I do not know that I hav earned the right to immortality; I do not know that I hav done aught to entitle me to the reward of eternal life.

But, having within this apprehension of a future which may be fraught with indescribable anguish, I invoke thy potent aid; I am adrift in mid-ocean, I cling to a straw in my desperation.

Tumultuous waves are above and about me and dash me from depth to crest.

The winds clutch me and shriek as if mocking my helplessness and desolation, and my ears are stunned with the clamors of the storm. All about me is darkness as dense as that of the grave.

The sun has disappeared, the stars shine not; rayless despair environs me and tenebrious horrors menace with annihilation. Command these winds and waves to sink to rest.

Sweep away the pall of darkness. Let the stars shine down with a promis of mortality in their sympathetic glances. Point out to me on the horizon of the ocean on which I am tossed the thither shores of a celestial world.

If thou art just, thou canst not leave me to struggle alone in this grewsome peril; I came not hither of my own accord; and now in thy omnipotence make me believe that which I cannot.

If thou art all-good, giv me a vision that stops not short of the further shore. Let me look beyond and see the light of glory shimmering on the everlasting plains of the hills of the better land.

Let my ear catch the echo of voices hymning exultant anthems over their final deliverance. I hear no response. The immensity into which I speak absorbs my voice, and it is lost. The awful space is void, and I speak only to emptiness. There is no ear to listen to the cry of humanity. I call only into the unfathomable depths of a void. There is no intelligence there, no sympathy, no substantiality—no God!

V.

The head of the old man dropped on the window-sill, and his long gray locks were tossed by the breezes of night. They caught up his last fearful utterance and carried it far out into the silence. The mystery of space, the vast distances of the shining points, the immensity of the universe, grew more oppressiv and menacing, and crushed out from his soul his last faint hope. POLINTO.

A Problem.

That there are many phenomena of Spiritualism that are honest and evince the activ participation of intelligences beyond ourselvs is indubitable. But the admission that our intelligence continues to exist after the destruction of the body, in a self-conscious state, involves an absurdity to all seeming. There are instances of persons losing part of the brain and thereby losing, during the whole of their after lives, all the characteristics identifying them. In such cases educated men hav lost all their learning and had to begin the very rudiments. All knowledge of their past lives has been lost, and all acquaintance with even their wives and children. Briefly, there has been perfect metempsychosis while occupying the same body. There hav also been cases where, from some injury to the brain, the person afflicted has lost all knowledge of past existence as well as consciousness of the present. They hav simply vegetated for years as it were, when, by some chance, the pressure or injury to the brain has been relieved and self-consciousness was restored instantly. Yet all memory, all knowledge of the past, was lost. Their wives and children were as strangers to them. We are then confronted with this seeming absurdity: to wit, destroy part of the brain or injure it and self-consciousness is annihilated; but destroy body and brain altogether and the self-consciousness continues to liv on!! Solve me this problem. HCLT.

What Is Money?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I desire, with your permission, to try to answer the above question. Certain Dr. F.'s ("doctors of finance") hav recently been inventing schemes by which to supply everybody with plenty of money, and all these schemes point to the same modus operandi, viz., a government stamp on something cheap and plenty, notably paper.

Mr. C. Dutton, in THE TRUTH SEEKER of August 1st, calls Colonel Ingersoll's attention to what he calls some "bottom facts" on the subject of "making money by law."

He says it is only necessary to come to an agreement as to what is money. How come to an agreement and who must agree? Is there any ambiguity or doubt as to the meaning of the word money? Long ago, during the sixteenth and seventeenth century, beads, wampum, and dried codfish were used as measures of value, but later civilization has given us something far better and more enduring and less changeable, gold, silver, copper and nickel, and our Congress has enacted that these metals only shall be coined into money, and when so coined shall become a legal tender for all debts.

It does not seem necessary to come to any agreement about the meaning of the word money. It is as plain and definit as any other word in the English language. See Webster's and Worcester's dictionaries and the history of money in the encyclopedias. Money means metallic coins.

Worcester givs an expression, paper money, and defines it as notes, drafts, bills of exchange, promises to pay money.

Some of the modern finance doctors hav been asking for fiat money and plenty of it. They are probably young, and hav not read with due attention the past histories of that fallacy.

I refer them to the French assignats, the Continental currency, the Confederate currency, and innumerable shinplasters of wildcat banks and speculativ individuals.

But the fiat fellows will say the government stamp will make all paper promises as good as gold. Not quite; as I remember during 1861–4, when government was getting in debt at the rate of a million a day, the currency, with the government stamp on it, became depreciated down to forty cents on the dollar, about equal to the proportion of gold and silver to the volume of the currency.

I am proud to say, however, that now the promises to pay of our government (agents of the people) are worth one hundred cents on the dollar, because it can and will pay.

I am not disposed to dispute with Mr. Dutton about the meaning of the word "make." It is not a synonym of "coin" as applied to converting metal into money. The Constitution does not say Congress shall hav power to "make" money.

The governments of all civilized countries coin their money of the precious metals, and they all stamp the value of the coins in accordance, nearly, with the intrinsic value of the metal used.

Mr. Dutton denies this and asserts that the idea has been exploded over and over again; if it has been so many times exploded, it must hav been fired off by the eloquent fiat advocates, and not heard by the antiquated friends of a solid metallic foundation to our currency.

I wish to paraphrase one of Mr. Dutton's sentences as follows, viz: Hence where the people's agents issue paper promises for the people to pay, they first assure themselvs that the debt they are creating is a just one, and the coin for its payment is within the present and prospectiv reach of the people's agents.

The substitution of "make" for "coin" is a quibble and without force. If Mr. Dutton takes one hundred pounds of gold and half a ton of silver bullion to the mint, the superintendent of the mint weighs it and givs Mr. Dutton a certificate that the bullion or coin is his, and that he can get it at any time by presenting the certificate.

Mr. Dutton is at some pains to make Colonel Ingersoll appear in favor of government's making plenty of (fiat) money so that the people won't hav to pay taxes; I don't understand the colonel to be so inconsistent, but that is his business, not mine.

I concede ingenuity and skill to Mr. Dutton in his well-written article, but he is evidently imbued with the modern fallacy that promissory notes are money, and that it is safe and desirable for governments to make an unlimited supply of them so that everybody can hav all they want.

Closing the World's Fair on Sunday.

The Sunday fanatics who claim to be such devotees of temperance are using every possible fair and foul means to insure the closing of the Fair at Chicago on Sundays.

They all claim thousands and thousands of people will be there from all parts of the country; they know that sleeping accommodations will be limited; that the average bedroom will not be a place of pleasant retreat or comfort during the day. Visitors cannot remain in their rooms. The fanatics want to close the Exposition on Sundays so visitors will be forced to go to the saloons; there will be no other places open if the Sunday fanatics hav their way—unless it be the churches and graveyards.

Is there a doubt in the mind of any rational being that closing the exhibition on Sundays will drive thousands of the visitors to the saloons? Where else can they go?

Will not the few extra dollars gathered in the collection plates from the few who succumb to the pressure and go to church be dearly obtained by such a scheme?

Can any plan be devised to insure a greater amount of drunkenness and debauchery, or more general "desecration of the holy American Sabbath?"

Petitions for Sunday closing of the World's Fair at Chicago should be truthfully indorsed, "Petition to aid the keepers of dives, gambling hells, and houses of ill-fame during the World's Fair at Chicago." C. B. REYNOLDS.

Christianity Under Nationalism.

The following letter was picked up in a railroad car. It has neither address nor signature, but may possibly catch the writer's eye in these columns:

REVEREND AND DEAR BROTHER: I hav just received your letter, and hasten to say, Amen, to all you write against dancing and probation for the heathen. But I must also say, my dear brother, that you look at Nationalism too much from the merely economic standpoint, which is really carnal and worldly. You fail to see that this is the cause of Christ! Why, just suppose all the railroads were now owned and run by the government. We, ministers of all churches, would insist on our right to free passes for ourselvs and our families on all the roads. We had them in the good old times; and we ought to now, for the same reason that the churches go untaxed. We get special privileges at the custom-house now; and no administration could afford to make us its enemies. Brother Harrison is especially friendly to us; and everybody knows how much we hav done for his party. If we had free passes, we could and should do a great deal more. He would be sure of being renominated next summer (and re-elected, too), for he would hav not only our aid, but that of all the station-agents, baggage-masters, conductors, brakemen, switch-tenders, and trackmen in the United States. They would all be Harrison men, and he could hav them all registered where he liked, so as to carry all the doubtful states. No trouble about their going home to vote! Whichever party has the chance to nationalize our railroads will secure a long lease of power. I trust in God to giv this opportunity to such an administration as that of Harrison and Wanamaker, for that would make us truly a Christian nation for evermore.

THE Freethinkers of Newark, N. J., are organizing a complimentary benefit-meeting for Miss Ada Campbell, the Australian lecturess, who leaves for England the end of this month. The meeting will take place Sunday, August 16th, at 7:30 P.M., at the Liberal League Hall, 177 Halsey street, corner of Market street (the committee having kindly tendered the use of the hall for the occasion). Miss Campbell will deliver a farewell lecture entitled, "Good and Evil, Vice and Virtue, Men and Women." Admission will be by ticket only. Ticket 50 cents.

The Decision Against Mr. King.

[The following is Judge Hammond's consideration of the religious issues involved in his decision against B. M. King, convicted of working on Sunday and fined $75. The consideration of the law points involved precedes it and is of about equal length. He holds that King was convicted by "due process of law," that working on Sunday is a common nuisance according to Tennessee law, which law is not unconstitutional, and that the fourteenth Amendment has not been violated in this case. Then he says:]

Perhaps this judgment should end here, and that, technically, nothing more should be said. Yet it may be due to counsel to giv some response to their extended and really very able arguments upon other questions which they think are involved, and which they wish to hav decided in this case. As we do not refuse their motion to discharge the petitioner because of any want of jurisdiction, but only because we decide that he has not been convicted with due process of law, as he alleges, it may not be improper, and, at least, it will emphasize our judicial allegiance to the principle already adverted to of the conclusivness, as a matter of evidence, of the verdict against him, if we say that but for that allegiance we should hav no difficulty in thinking that King has been wrongfully convicted. Not because he has any guarantee under the federal or state constitutions against a law denouncing him and punishing him for a nuisance in working on Sunday, for he has not.

It was a belief of Mr. Madison and other founders of our government that they had practically established absolute religious freedom and exemption from persecution for opinion's sake in matters of religion; but while they made immense strides in that direction, and subsequent progress in freedom of thought has advanced the liberalism of the conception these founders had, as a matter of fact, they left to the states the most absolute power on the subject, and any of them might, if they chose, establish a creed and a church and maintain it. The most they did, as they confessed, was to set a good example by the federal Constitution, and happily that example has been substantially followed in this matter, and by no state more thoroughly than Tennessee, where sectarian freedom of religious belief is guaranteed by the constitution; not in the sense argued here, that King, as a Seventh Day Adventist, or some other as a Jew, or yet another as a Seventh Day Baptist, might set at defiance the prejudices, if you please, of other sects having control of legislation in the matter of Sunday observances, but only in the sense that he should not himself be disturbed in the practices of his creed, which is quite a different thing from saying that in the course of his daily labor, disconnected with his religion, just as much as other people's labor is disconnected with their religion, labor not being an acknowledged principle or tenet of religion by him, nor generally or anywhere, he might disregard laws made in aid, if you choose to say so, of the religion of other sects. We say not acknowledged by him, because, although he testifies that the Fourth Commandment is as binding in its direction for labor on six days of the week as for rest on the seventh, he does not prove that that notion is held as a part of the creed of his sect and religiously observed as such, and we know, historically, that generally it has not been so considered by any religionists or their teachers. But if a nonconformist of any kind should enter the church of another sect, and those assembled there were required, every one of them, to comply with a certain ceremony, he could not discourteously refuse because his mode was different or because he did not believe in the divine sanction of that ceremony and rely upon this constitutional guaranty to protect his refusal. We do not say Sunday observance may be compelled upon this principle as a religious act, but only illustrate that the constitutional guarantee of religious freedom does not afford the measure of duty under such circumstances, nor does it any more, it seems to us, protect the citizen in refusing to conform to Sunday ordinances. It was not intended to hav that effect any more than under our federal Constitution the polygamists may defy the Christian laws against bigamy upon the ground of religious feeling or sentiment, the freedom of which has been guaranteed.

Nor do we believe King was wrongfully convicted, because Christianity is not a part of the law of the land, for in the sense pointed out by Mr. Chief-justice Clayton in State vs. Chandler, supra, and more recently by Dr. Anderson, a clergyman, before the Social Science Association (20 Alb. L. J., 265, 285), it surely is; but not in the dangerous sense so forcibly combated by Mr. Jefferson and other writers following him in the controversy over it. The Fourth Commandment is neither a part of the common law or the statute, and disobedience to it is not punishable by law; and certainly the substitution of the first day of the week for the seventh as a part of the commandment has not been accomplished by municipal process, and the substitution is not binding as such. The danger that lurks in this application of the aphorism has been noted by every intelligent writer under my observation, and all agree that this Commandment, either in its original form as practiced by petitioner, or in its substituted application to the first day of the week, is not more a part of our common law than the doctrin of the trinity or the Apostle's Creed. Nevertheless, by a sort of factitious advantage, the observers of Sunday hav secured the aid of the civil law and adhere to that advantage with great tenacity in spite of the clamor for religious freedom and the progress that has been made in the absolute separation of church and state, and in spite of the strong and merciless attack that has always been ready, in the field of controversial theology, to be made, as it has been made here, upon the claim of divine authority for the change from the seventh to the first day of the week. Volumes hav been written upon the subject, and it is not useful to attempt to add anything to it here. We hav no tribunals for its decision, and the efforts to extirpate the advantage above mentioned by judicial decision in favor of a civil right to disregard the change seem to me quite useless. The proper appeal is to the legislature, for the courts cannot change that which has been done, however done, by the civil law in favor of the Sunday observers. The religion of Jesus Christ is so interwoven with the texture of our civilization and every one of its institutions, that it is impossible for any man or set of men to liv amongst us and find exemption from its influences and restraints. Sunday observance is so essentially a part of that religion that it is impossible to rid our laws of it, quite as impossible as to abolish the custom we hav of using the English language or clothing ourselvs with the garments appropriate to our sex. The logic of personal liberty would allow, perhaps demand, a choice of garments, but the choice is denied. So civil or religious freedom may stop short of its logic in this matter of Sunday observance. It is idle to expect in government perfect action or harmony of essential principles, and whoever administers, whoever makes, and whoever executes the laws must take into account the imperfections, the passions, the prejudices, religious or other, and the errings of men because of these. We cannot hav in individual cases a perfect observance of Sunday according to the rules of religion; and, indeed, the sects are at war with each other as to the modes of observance. And yet no wise man will say that there shall be, therefore, no observance at all. Government leaves the warring sects to observe as they will, so they do not disturb each other, and as to the non-observer, he can be allowed his fullest personal freedom in all respects; largely he is allowed to do as he pleases, and generally there is no pursuit of him, in these days, as a mere matter of disciplining his conscience; but only when he defiantly sets up his non-observance by ostentatious display of his disrespect for the feelings or prejudices of others.

If the human impulse to rest on as many days as one can hav for rest from toil is not adequate, as it usually is, to secure abstention from daily vocations on Sunday, one may, and many thousands do, work on that day without complaint from any source; but if one ostentatiously labors for the purpose of emphasizing his distaste for or his disbelief in the custom, he may be made to suffer for his defiance by persecutions, if you call them so, on the part of the great majority, who will compel him to rest when they rest—as it does in many other instances compel men to yield individual tastes to the public taste, sometimes by positiv law, and sometimes by a universal public opinion and practice far more potential than a formal statute. There is scarcely any man who has not had to yield something to this law of the majority, which is itself a universal law, from which we cannot escape in the name of equal rights or civil liberty. As before remarked, one may not discard his garments and appear without them, or in those not belonging to the sex, and this illustration is used rather than others, frequently given, based on the laws of sanitation, education, criminal practices, cruelty, blasphemy, and the like, because it seems somewhat freer from the inherent element of injury to others, and contains likewise the element of a selection that would seem to be harmless in itself; so that it illustrates, pertinently, that one must observe the general custom as to a day of public rest, just as he must reasonably wear the garments of his sex selected by general custom. Therefore, while out of our sixty-four million of people there are a comparativly very few thousands who prefer the seventh day to the first as a day of rest and for religious observances, according to the strict letter of the Commandment, and who, possibly with good reason, resent the change that has been made as being without divine sanction, the fact remains that the change has been made by almost universal custom, and they must conform to it so far as it relates to its quality as a day of public rest.

And here it may be noted that sometimes too little heed is given in the consideration of the question to this quality of associated rest from labor. It is not altogether an individual matter of benefit from the rest, for undoubtedly to each individual one day of the seven would answer as well as another, but it is the benefit to the population of a general and aggregate cessation from labor on a given day which the law would secure, because for good reason, no doubt, found in our practice of it, it is beneficial to the population to do this thing, and they hav established the custom to do it. The fact that religious belief is one of the foundations of the custom is no objection to it as long as the individual is not compelled to observe the religious ceremonies others choose to observe in connection with their rest-days. As we hav said in the outset, not one of our laws or institutions or customs is free from the influence of our religion, and that religion has put our race and people in the very front of all nations in everything that makes the human race comfortable and useful in the world. This very principle of religious freedom is the product of our religion, as all our good customs are, and if it be desirable to extend that principle to the ultimate condition that no man shall be in the least restrained, by law or public opinion, in hostility to religion itself, or in the exhibition of individual eccentricities or practices of sectarian peculiarities of religious observances of any kind, or be fretted with laws colored by any religion that is distasteful to anybody, those who desire that condition must, necessarily, await its growth into that enlarged application. But the courts cannot, in cases like this, ignore the existing customs and laws of the masses, nor their prejudices and passions even, to lift the individual out of the restraints surrounding him because of those customs and laws before the time has come when public opinion shall free all men in the manner desired.

Therefore it is that the petitioner cannot shelter himself just yet behind the doctrin of religious freedom in defying the existence of a law and its application to him, which is distasteful to his own religious feeling or fanaticism, that the seventh day of the week, instead of the first, should be set apart by the public for the day of public rest and religious practices. That is what he really believes and wishes, he and his sect, and not that each individual shall select his own day of public rest and his own day of labor. His real complaint is, that his adversaries on this point hav the advantage of usage and custom and the laws founded on that usage and custom, not that religious freedom has been denied to him. He does not belong to the class that would abrogate all laws for a day of rest, because the day of rest is useful to religion and aids in maintaining its churches, for none more than he professes the sanctifying influence of the Fourth Commandment, the literal observance of which by himself and all men is the distinguishing demand of his own peculiar sect. His demand for religious freedom is as disingenuous here as is the argument of his adversary sects that it is the economic value of the day of rest and not its religious character which they would preserve by civil law. The truth is, both are dominated by their religious controversy over the day, but like all other motivs that are immaterial in the administration of the law, the courts are not concerned with them. Malice, religious or other, may dictate a prosecution, but if the law has been violated, this fact never shields the law-breaker. Neither do the courts require that there shall be some moral obloquy to support a given law before enforcing it, and it is not necessary to maintain that to violate the Sunday observance custom shall be of itself immoral, to make it criminal in the eyes of the law. It may be harmless in itself, because, as petitioner believes, God has not set apart that day for rest and holiness, to work on Sunday, and yet, if man has set it apart, in due form, by his law, for rest, it must be obeyed as man's law if not as God's law; and it is just as evil to violate such a law, in the eyes of the world, as one sanctioned by God—I mean just as criminal in law. The crime is in doing the thing forbidden by law, harmless though it be in itself. U. S. vs. Jackson, 24 Fed. Rep., 548; Re McCoy, 31 Fed. Rep., 794; S. C., 527; U. S., 731, 733. Therefore, all that part of the argument that it is not hurtful in itself to work on Sunday, apart from the religious sanctity of the day, is beside the question, for it may be that the courts would hold that repeated repetitions of a violation of law forbidding even a harmless thing could be a nuisance, as tending to a breach of the peace. 2 Bish. Cr. L., Section 965; 1 Ib., Section 812. Neglecting to do a thing is sometimes a nuisance. 1 Russ. Cr., 318. That is to say, a nuisance might be predicated of an act harmless in itself, if the will of the majority had lawfully forbidden the act, and rebellion against that will would be the gravamen of the offense—or, to express it otherwise, there is in one sense a certain immorality in refusing obedience to the laws of one's country, subjection to which God himself has enjoined upon us.

It is a nuisance. But whatever plenary power may exist in the state to declare repeated violations of its laws and the usages of its people a nuisance and criminal, until the case of Parker vs. State, supra, and until the case of King, to which we yield our judicial obedience, there seems not to hav been any law, statute or common, declaring the violation of the statutes against working on Sunday a common nuisance. Mr. Chief-justice Ruffin has demonstrated, we think, that there was no such common law of the mother state of North Carolina, from which we hav derived our common law and these statutes. M. & V. Code, 2 289, 2,009 2 010, 2 011, 2,012 2 013; Act N. C., 1,741; I Scott Rev., 55; Ib., 795; Cas. and Nich, 638; State vs. Williams, 4 Ired., 400; State vs. Brooksbank, 6 Ired., 73. The case of State vs. Lorry, 7 Bax., 95, is in accordance with these authorities, and I may say that, with some patience, I hav traced as far as I hav been able the common law authorities, and, if judgment rested with me, should say that there is not any foundation in them for ruling that it is a common law nuisance to work in one's fields on Sunday, and the supreme court of North Carolina so decided. Maul J., said in Rawlins vs. West Derby (2 C. B., 74), that "in the time of Charles II. an act of Parliament passed providing that certain things that formerly might hav been done on Sunday should no longer be done on that day, all other things being left to the freedom of the common law." This act was not adopted by North Carolina or by Tennessee as part of their common law, but was by North Carolina and afterward by Tennessee substantially re-enacted, and is the foundation of our Sunday laws. The precedent for a common law indictment taken by Chitty from a manual known as the "Circuit Companion," was omitted from subsequent editions (2 Chit. Cr., 6 ed., 20 and note). And while many American courts hav laid hold of the statements in the old text writers that such an indictment was known at common law, and upon their authority subsequent writers hav proceeded to state the text law to be so, it is quite certain that no adjudicated case in England can be found to establish the statement that, strictly and technically, there was any such offense known to the common law. In this sense it may be said that King was wrongfully convicted, the State vs. Lorry wrongfully overruled, and Parker vs. State wrongfully decided, but it does not belong to this court to overrule these decisions, and it does belong to the state court to make them, and King's conviction under them is "due process of law."

The Cause in Washington.

The Sunday fanatics are meeting sore trials and discouragements throughout the entire state, and are becoming badly demoralized.

At Spokane all the cases were dismissed, and the fanatics routed. J. H. C. Scurlock, the indefatigable Infidel worker for liberty and right, writes: "The Sunday-closing fanatics are quite discouraged; excitement is on the wane. Liberals are virtually victorious. Send fifty more copies of 'Sunday Laws' pamphlet."

At Walla Walla three victims were arrested for keeping open on Sunday. On trial the jury promptly acquitted them.

Events at Tacoma are narrated in this extract:

The decision of Judge Emmet Parker of the municipal court, on motion to dismiss the case of Wm. C. Fink, is not pleasing to the Anti-Sunday Saloon Association or their special attorneys, Parsons and Corell. The action was instituted on complaint of one C. A. Toneson in the interests of the Anti-Sunday Saloon Association against one Fink, a saloonkeeper, for violation of the law in keeping open on Sunday.

As the members of the association had felt sore at the failures to convict by the prosecuting attorney, in this last case, by consent of the latter, Parsons and Corell, special counsel, represented the state.

At the close of the second trial the court announced that the case could not go to trial the third time without the consent of the prosecuting attorney, who was not then present, but was invited to be present at a time fixed by the court for the purpose of being heard. He afterward appeared, as reported in Friday's Telegraph, and filed a motion asking that the case be dismissed, giving as reasons in his motion that two juries had failed to agree; that the evidence in the third trial was no better or worse than in the last two, and in several cases now pending of a similar nature; that this was not sufficient to justify the state in taking further proceedings, and as two disagreements are generally sufficient to end any criminal case, he did not believe the case against Fink should be an exception.

Parsons and Corell resisted on the part of the ministers who were prosecuting, and contended that it was the right of any citizen to institute and carry on by himelf or counsel the prosecution of cases of this kind, and insisted that the prosecuting attorney had no right to appear in the case at all. They denied that they represented the state by courtesy of the prosecuting attorney, but as a matter of right, representing the state of Washington.

The court held that the special counsel had no standing in the case whatever, except by consent and in subordination to the county attorney; that their standing was not sufficient to permit them to argue in resistance to the motion, except from the fact that the district attorney did not object.

The court refused to allow the special attorneys to participate in any more liquor cases, or to file any more papers without the consent of the defense.

This is said to be the first time in the history of this state that the standing of the prosecuting attorney has been questioned by hired prosecutors.—Seattle Telegraph.

The Rev. Blatherskite Patterson, in his sensational sermon denouncing the jurors who refused to convict, declared: "Tacoma is the prime mover in this moral reform, but other cities—Spokane, Walla Walla, Portland, Seattle, and every city of any considerable importance—is moved by our example to attempt the same thing. If it fails here all the good forces in these sister cities will be discouraged, and all the opposing forces correspondingly encouraged. And it is a struggle not only for the present but for a long period of time. Let this cause fail now and it will be years before such a movement will be inaugurated again."

We sincerely hope the dolorous whine of the "meek and lowly follower of the lamb" will be verified. It will if vigorous work on the part of the Washington Secular Union will help to attain so desirable a condition of things.

We are pushing the circulation of our pamphlet, "Facts in Regard to Sunday Laws," and securing the insertion in leading newspapers throughout the state of telling articles on the subject that cannot fail to educate the people and force honest Christians to examin the "reasons of their faith and hope."

Some good but unthinking people are opposed to any action on the part of the Washington Secular Union or its officers against enforcing closing of saloons on Sunday.

This is the dregs of their orthodoxy; they would do evil that good might come of it. It is never right to sanction wrong, or even tacitly sanction any encroachments on our liberties.

The attempt of the Sunday fanatics to close the saloons on Sunday is only to gain sympathizers, whom they will use to help enforce rigid Sunday observance in all other business.

Closing the saloon on Sunday is self-evidently done in the interest of Sunday, rather than of temperance.

Why close saloons on Sunday any more than on any other day? Why, Sunday is the Sabbath. Sunday is the Lord's day. Sunday is the day of religious worship. Exactly. Then Sunday laws, whether for Sunday closing, Sunday rest, or Sunday worship, are religious laws, and every true Liberal, every friend of reason, right, and justice, should oppose all such laws.

If it is right or allowable to do any act on one day of the week, it is just as right and lawful on any other day of the week.

Acts are good or bad in themselvs and cannot be made virtuous or vicious by the particular day when they are performed.

Forced to Take Their Own Medicin.

It is consoling to contemplate that the narrow-minded, bigoted, and cruel Puritans of the eighteenth century sometimes found their match, and were compelled to take a dose of their own soul-saving medicin. In the year 1774 one of his majesty's war-ships lay in Boston harbor commanded by an old salt named Leo. Captain Leo was a veteran seaman who, not having the fear of God before his eyes, and being ignorant of or disregarding the existence of stringent Puritanical Sunday laws, went ashore on the "Lord's day" for a promenade on terra firma and to enjoy a short respit from the confinement of life on board the ship.

Now, it so happened that some sanctimonious, God-fearing churchman took cognizance of the fact that Captain Leo was desecrating the Sabbath by walking about in an irreverent manner, and at once had him arrested and put in the stocks for the balance of the day. While confined in the stocks he was visited by self-constituted committees of pious Christians who made his confinement still more aggravating by reprimanding him severely for his irreverence and admonishing him to forsake the error of his ways and flee from the wrath to come. The agony and smothered rage endured by this old matter-of-fact tar, and the fearful yet silent oaths and maledictions he pronounced against his bigoted persecutors while thus confined, may never be known.

When released he manifested the deepest penitence for the fearful act of desecration he had committed. He attended prayer-meeting, cultivated the acquaintance of the devout magistrates and holy deacons, and played the role of a contrite, God-fearing man, much to the gratification of the Puritanical saints. When the day arrived for his departure from port, he invited the magistrate, minister, deacon, and his informers to dine with him, which invitation was gladly accepted. Captain Leo regaled the appetites of his guests on divers luxuries, and many were the bumpers turned off to his health. The repast finished, at a preconcerted signal twelve brawny sailors rushed in and overpowered and bound the guests, much to their surprise and discomfiture. From festiv scenes in the cabin they were carried on deck and lashed to the mast-stays. The captain then appeared before them and informed them that while he was sitting in the stocks, scorched by the heat of the sun, they had exhorted him on the efficacy of mortifying the flesh for the welfare of the soul, and that having their spiritual welfare at heart, he purposed to inflict on them a little mortification of the body, so that they might leave the vessel not only temporally, but spiritually refreshed. The brawny boatswain then appeared with knout in hand, and gave each one of these Boston saints a merciless whipping, after which, with brotherly admonition, the captain put them aboard of a boat and sent them ashore. That land-lubbers were afterward put in the stocks and were publicly whipped by the sanctimonious Puritans for the desecrating act of walking irreverently on Sunday there is no doubt, but the reasonable supposition is that exceptions were made in favor of sea-captains who went ashore for a Sunday promenade.

Astonishing

That any man laying any claim to intelligence or correct knowledge of history should compare the United States of America in 1880 or 1890 with the Continental government of 1775 and 1776 and the paper issues of the Continental Congress with those of the United States at this time, and insist or even intimate that because the former money was a partial failure, the latter must of necessity be. We hav little or no confidence in the honesty or patriotism of the hired authors who now, at the bidding of Wall street, point to the example of the Continental government as a warning to the greatest nation not to issue paper money. Let them be reminded of the following facts:

Our fathers were not at the time a nation. They had pledged their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor in support of their right to be independent. We, through their sacrifices, hav been a nation one hundred years. They numbered only three million of souls; we number sixty million. Thirteen states composed the confederation; we number more than forty. Their western boundary was the Mississippi river; ours, the Pacific ocean. They had no fortifications, no army, no navy, no canals, no railroads, no steamboats, no steamships, no telegraphs, no Constitution, no laws made thereunder; no legislativ, judicial, or executiv departments of the government; no national duties on imports, no national internal revenue, no manufactories, no experienced artisans, no money, no credit, and then foreign commerce was at the time cut off. We hav fortifications at every assailable point; can in a short time put a million of brave men under arms, well equipped, and can cover the ocean with our ships. Our canals connect our inland seas with the ocean. The whole Union is checkered with railroads, connecting all parts of the country, even the Atlantic and the Pacific. Our manufacturing establishments are found in every state in the Union. Our machine-shops hav been supplied with the most experienced artisans. Our agricultural products enable us to export more than $500,000,000 per annum. Our duties on imports amount to over $200,000,000 annually. Our internal revenue and the production of the precious metals amount to many millions more. In view of these facts, how preposterous to compare the United States of 1880 or 1890 with the Continental government in 1776, and their issues of paper money with those of the United States now. The Continental government failed to meet its obligations. The government of the United States under the Constitution never has. In 1776 the Continental government had established no credit at home or abroad. The government of the United States has established a first-class credit both at home and abroad. A currency issued by the government of the United States, made a legal tender in all parts of the nation, paid out for all debts due by the government, and received into the treasury for all debts due the nation, can never be at discount for coin.

Mr. Calhoun in few words expresses the difference between Continental money and United States treasury notes. He says "the former was a promis to pay without revenue, but the latter is a promis to receive for revenue, with abundance of revenue to receive." We add that the former promis was not made by a nation, to be fulfilled by a nation. The latter is made by a nation having the ability to perform.

History may be a very good teacher, but it is not a teacher that can giv brains to the student.

Cannot the people of the United States do in this age what Venice did successfully, with paper money, for more than three hundred years? Of course they can, and will; all the learned financial quacks, including presidents of colleges, bank presidents, and thousands of others, mere pimps of Wall street, to the contrary notwithstanding.

What Has Become of "Private Judgment?"

In the earlier part of his conflict with the church, Luther appealed from the authority of popes and councils to that of the Bible. That book, he affirmed, must be the believer's sole rule and guide. The popish doctors said they agreed to this; but it must be the Bible as interpreted and explained by the authorities of the church. So far Luther had gained nothing. But he saw his dilemma and extricated himself by a bold stroke. No, he said; the believer must interpret the Bible for himself. His party saw in this a happy escape from ecclesiastical bondage; and the "Right of private judgment" became the rallying-cry of the Protestant Reformation. As a principle it became the foundation of the movement as well as the banner under which their victories were won. The phrase sounded like a bugle-note of religious liberty and touched the hearts of thousands already tired of the mummeries and disgusted with the corruptions of the popish church.

But where is the right of private judgment now? In defiance of their own vaunted principle, the leaders of the various Protestant sects went to work to construct creeds, and imposed on their followers their own versions of biblical teaching. This was a clear case of self-stultification; for if, as they had so positivly claimed, each man was his own interpreter, with what face could they tell him what he must believe? And if the disciple was the sole judge for himself of what the Bible taught, why insult him by thrusting a creed into his face? Or if, by any trick of casuistry, a creed may be assigned any place in the Protestant system, what do the ecclesiastics gain by it, since the disciple's right to interpret it is just as good as his right to interpret the Bible? Nay, it is better; for a creed is entirely a human production, while the Bible, according to these dictating saints, is divinely inspired. Does it lie in their lips to say that a man may judge the word of God but may not question the work of a fellow-worm? Amid the flames of controversy that now threaten to consume the Protestant sects, it is not impertinent for the perplexed believer to ask where these self-constituted guardians of the faith acquired the right or the power to set up the authority of a creed as paramount to that of the Bible.

Why do not these heretics for whom the gridiron is now being heated turn upon their pursuers? Instead of begging their persecutors to believe that they do not mean to upset the creeds, why not challenge the right to impose them? Nay, not standing on the defensiv, why not carry the war into the enemy's country? They might easily fling in the faces of their persecutors a defiance like this: "In attempting to put us upon the rack, you are repudiating the right of private judgment; you are abandoning the ground on which you sought to escape the Romish church. You are attempting the impossible feat of accepting and renouncing a doctrin in the same breath. If you stand on the corner-stone of the Protestant faith you cannot deny to us the right of private judgment; if you respect that right you cannot lay your hands upon us. But if you reject the foundation of Protestantism there is nothing for you to do but to creep into the bosom of the Catholic church, and kiss the pope's toe."

This, indeed, might not bring these idiotic saints to their senses, but it might expose them to the ridicule of mankind. And in what way can ridicule be put to better use than in breaking the chains of bigotry—even if it may not make ecclesiastical despots ashamed of their efforts to shackle the understandings of men. Out of these petty religious squabbles it is not too much to expect that some even of the benighted ones may learn something better than to follow the vagaries of senseless superstition.

Is It Right to Be a Lawbreaker?

The daily papers in this city hav raised a question as interesting to reformers as to their own editors. The law condemning capital criminals to be executed by electricity makes it a misdemeanor to publish accounts of the execution beyond the bare statement that the condemned was done away with at a certain time. All of the papers violated the law, and all hav been indicted.

The claim they make is that the law is a violation of the constitution of the state: "Every citizen may freely speak, write and publish his sentiments on all subjects, being responsible for the abuse of that right; and no law shall be passed to restrain or abridge the liberty of speech or of the press." And they propose to defend what they consider their rights. They also propose to carry the matter into politics and force the legislature to repeal the law.

On the other hand, the upholders of the law hav arguments in support of the law (and this is where retributiv justice appears) based on the decisions in the Comstock cases. A noted lawyer of this city states the arguments thus:

"The constitutional provision relied on to defeat the statute does not meet its express provisions. The constitutional provision authorizes: Firstly, 'every citizen to freely speak, write, and publish his sentiments on all subjects.' This provision is confined to 'sentiment.' Judicial interpretation has substantially come to the rescue of Anthony Comstock and the haters of lotteries by interpolating after the words 'on all subjects' a limitation in phraseology amounting to this, 'excepting subjects that tend to demoralize, etc.' Secondly, the constitutional provision forbids 'a law to be passed to restrain or abridge the liberty of speech or of the press.' But judicial interpretation has interpolated substantially, 'except treasonable sentiments tending to subvert government or to shock decency or public sentiment.' Many decisions between 1862 and 1864 were made justifying dealings by criminal law with men uttering or editors printing treasonable expressions. The maxim Salus populi suprema lex—the safety of the people is the supreme law—underlies even constitutional interpretation.

"Yet some might argue that the denial of such an abridgment of the liberty of the press as in the constitution is expressed verbatim and literatim would prevent a legislature from enacting laws against blasphemous utterances and expressions. The subject comes down to the questions what is 'restraining or abridging' and what is meant by 'liberty of the press;' and these questions the courts hav already pretty fully answered. For instance, the constitution boldly forbids 'cruel and unusual punishment' to be inflicted. Perhaps half of the populace, and very many lawyers believed electrocution or electrocussion to be cruel, as it certainly was unusual and, indeed, unknown when the constitution-makers adopted the word. But the courts, in construing the naked letter of the constitution, gave effect to their declaration that such punishment was not an unusual one.

"Moreover the disputed prohibitiv section of the electrocution statute is to be construed in strict relation to purely state affairs. It does not operate upon private, social or business affairs that affect individuals or the community. The state alone has authority to take human life. It chooses to take it semi-secretly. No one disputes its authority to make an execution private or quasi-private; or to exclude the curious-monger and the idle spectator from the shocking spectacle. It is wholly an affair of state. If the state can lawfully and constitutionally exclude individual knowledge of the details of such a state act through spectatorship why can it not equally exclude equal knowledge of such details by written or printed accounts? The state is sole judge of its own exclusiv act. The constitutional prohibition against restricting free speech is for the benefit of the community. But in an execution the community has no constitutional right. We cannot place an exclusiv act of the state concerning its own exclusiv responsibility on the same plane that is occupied by individuals or by personal or property rights."

If this should prove to be the view taken by the courts, and the legislature should refuse to repeal the law, these editors who hav been supporting Comstock and upholding blasphemy laws will be nicely strung up with their own rope.

But, whatever view is taken by the courts as to the constitutionality of the law, and whatever the legislature may in future see fit to do, according to the decision of the United States district court for Western Tennessee, in the King case, the editors are all criminals, deserving of punishment. Judge Hammond said in that case:

"Malice, religious or otherwise, may dictate a prosecution; but if the law has been violated, this fact never shields the law-breaker. Neither do the courts require that there shall be some moral obloquy to support a given law before enforcing it, and it is not necessary to maintain that to violate the Sunday observance custom shall be of itself immoral to make it criminal in the eyes of the law. It may be harmless in itself—because, as petitioner believes, God has not set apart that day for rest and holiness—to work Sunday, and yet, if man has set it apart in due form by his law for rest, it must be obeyed as man's law, if not as God's law. And it is just as evil to violate such a law in the eyes of the world as one sanctioned by God—I mean just as criminal in law. The crime is in doing the thing forbidden by law, harmless though it be in itself. Therefore all that part of the argument that it is not hurtful in itself to work Sunday, apart from the religious sanctity of the day, is beside the question."

How do our great moral editors like that opinion—they who hav supported Comstock and denounced the talking Anarchist. Most and the Socialists of Chicago maintained that no matter what the law might be it must be respected and obeyed until repealed? All that Most did was to talk in alleged violation of law, and he is now in the penitentiary. They hav written and published in acknowledged violation of law, and why should they not hav a cell next to his? The constitution says a man may freely speak on all subjects. Most is in jail. It also says a man may write and publish freely. The editors of the daily papers do not expect to go to jail at all! But who among them defended Most's rights! The district attorney, even, would not hav indicted these editors if they had not asked him to do so. "It would be impracticable," he says, "to get these indictments without the concurrence of the newspapers." Indeed! Did he obtain the concurrence of Herr Most? It looks very much as though there is one law for the rich and powerful and another for the poor and weak, and this is a shameful thing.

But aside from this, there is another and a broader question. Is it right to break a law which seems unjust? We hope the editors of the great dailies and the ethical people who hav decided all things against practical reformers will attack this question.

A New Christian Theology.

As a sample of the imbecility of mind to which belief in holy writ reduces people a circular received from Elizabeth M. Gordon, of Cooperstown, N. Y., is valuable. An explainer of the divine word usually makes himself ridiculous, judged from common-sense standpoints, but Miss Gordon explains it so cocksurely that her exegesis approaches the sublime. She is, she says, authorized to speak for God, and she speaks with no weakling's voice. In her hands the whole biblical scheme becomes as plain as a sum in addition. Commentaries are made useless. The "higher" critics can go to preaching, as their labors are of no further value. Spiritualists need speculate no more. Materialists may cease to investigate. She has solved all problems, and knows, what no one else ever found out, just what the plans of God are, and just how they are carried out. And this is the way of salvation:

The holy spirit emanates from the godhead as vapor from the ocean, and is the conscience of mankind. The spirit of evil comes from the devil in the same way. God givs his spirit to the child in the proportion of five-sixths to Satan's one-sixth. The child becomes responsible to God for its actions at seven years of age. People are saved by passing through the winepress of the wrath of God, which is remorse after the death of the body, its duration proportioned to their guilt. Those who do not believe Jesus to be God's son hav one hour's remorse, but those who accept him pass at once into bliss. Those who yield to Satan's influences hav a thousand years of remorse. The totally depraved sleep until the last judgment and then wake up to exactly nine hundred and ninety-two years of remorse, after suffering which they will be annihilated. This somewhat lengthy period of remorse is inflicted, we imagin (only imagination can deal with this subject), to illustrate the goodness of God, as Miss Gordon tells us that he takes no pleasure in the sufferings of the wicked. Heaven is infinit space, without beginning and without end, and the happiness thereof consists in loving God, an occupation which one would imagin would pall upon the subjects after a few million years. The geological speculation is settled by the statement that the world has been inhabited for six millions six thousands of years. The flood was six thousand years ago. Adam and Eve were created simultaneously "out of the varied clays of the earth." This probably accounts for the variation between men and women for which the old deacon so earnestly thanked God. It required one thousand years to build them; "and this is the testimony of God the Holy Ghost, who has come to purify the human race of their delusions and to rule this world with a rod of iron, which means that God the creator will destroy all the inhabitants of this world who refuse to giv up their delusions and obey his Ten Commandments and Sermon on the Mount of Jesus Christ."

There is one thing to be said in favor of this program: it is definit, precise, and intelligible. It requires no Westminster Confessions to explain it, nor ecumenical councils to vote upon it, and ministers of the "church universal," of which it is the creed, could not dodge its provisions, though, alas! there is one heretic among the priesthood now, and that is Miss Gordon herself, for she tells us privately that she is authorized (by God, we presume) to say that the only worship God appreciates is obedience. With that he will be satisfied. But, she adds, as most people hanker after some kind of worship [i.e., like to be humbugged] God has given us the church universal, with the foregoing platform. Probably, if Miss Gordon has good luck and is handsome, she will found a church to rival Schweinfurth's, and there will be one more Christian sect. Her theology is something better than Calvin's, and to that extent we wish her success. But if the Christian Bible had never been written she would probably be as sane as anybody.

A Public School Conducted by a Sect.

The inevitable result of allowing religious teachers to influence the conduct of schools is again shown by the school war in a school district of Rondout, N. Y., which has been going on for three years, with a temporary victory for the Catholics. The fight is between Catholics, Protestants, and Jews, and is owing to the fact that the public is compelled to support a sectarian school.

The district involved in the quarrel is one of the largest in the place, the school being supervised by a board of trustees. For twenty years the Catholics controled the school, having as principal James McCabe, but charges being made that he was incompetent, the tax-payers, who thought a change was necessary, turned out in force, and at two successiv elections triumphed and gained control of the board of trustees. Principal McCabe was removed and Prof. Robert Eadie, of Long Island City, was selected in his stead. Under his management the school has had an increased attendance. But the fight did not end there; on the contrary, it has increased in bitterness. A few years ago, the main school-building being inadequate to accommodate the children of the district, the board of trustees were empowered to hire a branch-school. In the district is St. Mary's Roman Catholic church, one of the largest of that denomination along the Hudson. Its present pastor is the Rev. Dr. Burtsell, formerly of the Epiphany, of New York, and who was sent to Rondout by Archbishop Corrigan as a punishment for his sympathy with the McGlynn movement. Connected with the parish is a Franciscan brothers' school. The old board of trustees rented this as a branch to the free public school, to be under the control of the Franciscan brothers. A year ago a movement was made to enlarge the public school-building and abolish the branch school. At the annual meeting it was voted down and the branch school again rented. Last week a trustee was to be elected, and the utmost excitement prevailed. The adherents of the church had packed the meeting, and the opposition to abolish the branch school was voted down. The church also elected its candidate for trustee, and the Protestants are so angry that a committee of citizens will endeavor to do away with the sectarian school, and if necessary go into the courts to do so.

We hope this last plan will be tried. A public school supported by public funds under the charge of a religious sect is an anomaly which we do not think even the most pious judge will countenance —especially if the sect be not his.

Three Investigating Seances.

The American Psychical Society, the formation of which was noticed in these columns recently, has begun its investigation of modern Spiritualism, and secured at the outset some surprising results. The first séance was held under the direction of the secretary of the society, with Miss Josephine Lord, of Lowell, Mass., as the medium. Miss Lord is described as young, "livs with her father and mother, has never known anything of Spiritualism, and until recently has been a member and a constant attendant of the First Baptist church. About two years ago her favorit brother was taken very ill. A female friend, who was calling, foretold his immediate death, which, proving correct, impressed Miss Lord and family very much. Heartbroken, they sought, like many others, consolation in Spiritualism, and thus began the mediumistic career of Miss Lord."

At the first séance the phenomena were as follows: Three canes, one of wood, another of glass, and another of steel, were made to stand upon the floor for five minutes in a vertical position. At a command from Miss Lord the canes moved in any direction indicated, but they would not respond to a request made by any other person in the room. She then took one of the sticks in her hand, and, although apparently holding it lightly between her fingers, no person present was able to take it from her.

The manifestations at the second séance were like this: Sitting in the dim light around the table, shadowy forms were seen plainly moving here and there, bending over and breathing some words of comfort in a whisper; then seeming to rise in the air, to be lost in the deepening shadows.

There stood at a little distance from the table a large rocking-chair, which all at once began to rock. Gradually it slid nearer to the table, and pushed itself between two of the persons sitting there, then it stopped for a moment and slowly rose a few inches from the floor, falling back again with a loud thud. It rose somewhat higher a second time, returning quickly to the floor again. Making a third attempt, as though moved by some superhuman force, it lifted itself squarely on the top of the table, and began rocking violently.

A murmur of surprise went through the room. After a little delay, Mr. Flower declared himself wonderstruck, and suggested that the chair be returned to the floor, saying as he did so: "Could anyone sit in the chair, I wonder? and if so, could both be lifted?"

Instantly three hard raps were heard, which is the signal for "yes." Having thus gained the consent of the unseen agents, Mrs. Flower, with much trepidation, seated herself in the chair, the company meantime all singing a familiar hymn. This had continued for a few minutes only, when the chair, despite all of Mrs. Flower's efforts to prevent it, began slowly to rock backward and forward. In vain did the occupant place her feet upon the floor and protest that the chair should not move. It continued, gaining gradually in force and velocity.

Every eye was fixed upon the chair and its occupant, which were both plainly visible in the semi-twilight. An exclamation of fear arose as the chair was lifted with its occupant fully ten inches from the floor, and then sunk back again just as it had done in the first instance.

"Are you afraid?" asked several persons of Mrs. Flower. They saw she looked somewhat pale.

"N-o-o, not very," was the answer hesitatingly given.

The last word had not left her lips when, as though with one mighty effort, the chair and its occupant were both placed on the center of the table, in the presence of the astonished company.

The third séance is thus described: 'In the presence of the same company, about the same phenomena occurred, with an additional mystery. Near the ceiling was a large picture-hook. One of the men present asked permission to place something on it, and was told by loud raps that he might do so. A stool was placed on the table, and he folded a bank-note lengthwise and tied it about the hook. After he took his seat all joined hands, and soon all were softly singing. The light was very dim. Not more than five minutes had passed before the medium uttered a cry more like the war-whoop of an Indian than anything else. Throwing her hands upward she caught the bank-note from the air just above her own head.

This manifestation concluded the séance, and "the members of the society expressed their complete satisfaction with what had occurred, and suggested a continuance of these remarkable séances in the autumn."

The value to science of these investigations is apparent from these descriptions. We are, therefore, at a loss to know why the Banner of Light writes in such a sarcastic vein concerning them.

Brother Colby says: "History is ever repeating itself. The physical phenomena, and many of the mental experiences which accompanied the advent of the New Dispensation over forty years ago, and hav been measurably laid aside by the veterans in the subsequent lapse of time, are now being brought to the front by the new-comers into the movement as grounds for wonderful surprise, or are paraded as a gravamen for the theologico scientific indorsement by 'profound observers' outside the ranks of Spiritualism of a 'something' new and out of the common course, and highly worthy [their distinguished consideration.'" It looks as though Brother Colby holds a light opinion of the fitness of the investigators to investigate, and is very far from being so sure of the value of their labors as the investigators themselvs. This is unkind, as those of the society who are not already Spiritualists seem perfectly willing to be convinced on as little evidence as there is for the miracles attributed to Christ Jesus.

Enlarging Their Province.

The arrogance of the Roman Catholic priesthood and the servitude of their dupes is shown by a recent occurrence in South Meriden, Conn., where the priest has ordered the young ladies of his flock to dismiss their lovers who may be Protestant. And not only in general does the order apply, but the priest has come down to particulars, and written to one young man to let go of his Catholic sweetheart. The priest explained why he wrote the letter to a reporter. "I thought by writing him a gentlemanly letter and telling him the objections of the church to such a course he might stop. The parents of the young lady were a little loath to tell him to quit her, and I told them I would. I hav no personal feelings against him. He is a man of good morals so far as I know, but it is for the future that I am looking. Why, sir, I hav been looking over the records of marriages in this village and Yalesville for a number of years past, and I find some twenty-three mixed marriages. By mixed I mean a union of Catholic and Protestant. Such unions tend to degenerate the faith on both sides, and, as a rule, generally end in Infidelity. Of the twenty-three marriages I refer to not a child attends any church. So you can see how it is. I hav not taken up this matter out of personal feeling, but am acting more as a Christian clergyman than as a single person, and am carrying out the mandates of the church in so doing. The rules of the church are decidedly against such unions, and I see that at a recent meeting of Protestant ministers in New York they passed resolutions to the same effect, or did something similar. It was to stop these so-called mixed marriages. The Catholic church permits no such marriage unless under a special dispensation and a written statement from the Protestant to allow the Catholic to follow the teachings of our church."

Some of the young ladies hav surrendered to the priest, others hav rebelled and been refused communion.

What a blessed time it will be for priests and preachers when the two sects can regulate the heart affairs and control the courting of their members!

MR. N. CHADDOCK, of Cuero, Texas, is to be commended for the work for Liberalism he is doing in the Lone Star State. He subscribes for the Liberal journals, and then, being an amateur printer, prints extracts from them and circulates them among his neighbors. In this way he stirs up the saints. His last print he calls the Gleaner, and in it appear quotations from four different journals of theological reform. Mr. Chaddock is doing well.

THERE are 12,563,894 pupils in the public schools of the country, and it requires 361,273 teachers to instruct them. These children are to govern the country in the future, and it is part of the longheaded policy of the churches to influence their education. With all her efforts Rome has got only 673,601 pupils in her parochial schools, and she must lose ground unless she can control the public schools. To do this all her efforts are bent, and she is a formidable danger to the welfare of the nation.

Letters from Friends.

Enheartening Praise.

SALIDA, COL., July 30, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I hav taken THE TRUTH SEEKER nearly twelve years, and like it better every year. The pictures are immense. Long life to Heston, also John Peck and many others. To my mind this is the grandest paper on earth.

OTIS WHITE.

A Noble Work, We Hope.

GRANT PASS, ORE., July 12, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find twenty-five cents for the TRUTH SEEKER ALMANAC. Yours of 1890 just suits me. You are doing a noble work; and be assured, Freethought is gaining ground fast in this country. I hav labored in the cause of Freethought for thirty years, and like it.

Yours for truth, WILLIAM M. RICHARDS.

Till Wanamaker Bleats.

RICHMOND, ILL., July 10, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I want THE TRUTH SEEKER and I am lost without it. I will try to get some subscribers here. Send me all the back numbers you please for distribution. I would like you to send me Peck's "India Rubber God," also "Church before the Court." I want them for my own use. I hav got his last one on the opening of the Exposition on the Sabbath. I am a farmer and almost seventy-four years old. I hav been cultivating corn to-day; am writing this at noon while the horse is eating. I wish you success in all your honest undertakings. I hope you will punch Wanamaker until he bleats, if nothing more.

Sincerely yours, I. C. KILGORE.

Oklahoma's First Secular Society.

GUTHRIE, OKLAHOMA TERR., July 31, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Last Sunday we formed a temporary organization of the Secular Union. An ex-Baptist minister was elected chairman, and he is just the right man for the place and held in high esteem by the church people, who, I presume, mourn the loss of a minister so dear to them. But Rev. Mr. Burrows could no longer preach miracles or hold a bad opinion of the almighty, and has therefore sacrificed a good salary to hav freedom. Dr. Lee, an organizer of the Secular Union, is also with us and doing good work. Mrs. Townsend, an activ worker for Freethought, deserves great credit for her ardent labor in the good cause, as do also Dr. and Mrs. Smith. We are the first Secular society in the territory. Yours, CAPT. JOHN TWAMLEY, Sec.

For Mental Dyspeptics.

NOOKSACK, WASH., July 4, 291.

MR. EDITOR: My taste is for more evolutionary and ethical philosophy. Less ridicule for the old. Encourage the youth; let the old die easy. John Peck's peck will feed more (mental dyspeptics) than the "loaves and fishes," and better fare. I am proud to say, we hav a working Peck in Washington—a fighting bushel—C. B. Reynolds, who has recently stifled the Lord's Prayer in our public school teacher's mouth. Our praying people call ours an "Infidel constitution." The tendency of our school law will be relief to that class of teachers now pandering to the church element, and, like the mercantil agency, impel to more honesty.

When will man be honest to himself against all bias of friends, money, place, power—the root of all honesty?

J. W. BELL.

Two Brands from the Burning.

GRINNELL, IA., June 15, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I herewith send the names of two new subscribers and a draft for $5. I am ever so glad to be able to add them to your list of readers. No doubt they will prove permanent ones. One brother is so full of the holy spirit of Freethought that it constantly overflows and at every opportunity, like fire, burns and scorches the dog-fennel of superstition. He used to be a shouting Methodist, and in trying to convert a Universalist, and thus insure his soul against fire, he instead was converted to a more rational belief; but instead of stopping there, he kept on investigating and seeking truth until he safely landed on the shore of common sense and Freethought. The other brother has been a skeptic; but Ingersoll's lectures and a few copies of the dear old TRUTH SEEKER fixed him about right, and he now wonders why or how it came about that he has dwelt so long in the twilight of doubt. The fog has cleared away, and he now basks in the glorious sunshine of reason and Freethought. We all like Heston's pictures and the "Letters from Friends." The children like the "Corner;" and adults can learn much by studying it. Fraternally yours,

W. T. LEINS.

The American Banditti.

NEWPORT, O., June 24, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $10. I hav delayed trying to secure another subscriber, but cannot get him. I would like to do more for you myself, but I am too well protected—protected in wearing shoddy, faded clothes, and in having "honest money" to do business with. In other words, I am protected in being robbed by railroad companies, telegraph companies, manufacturers, and money-changers. How long, O Lord, how long must we suffer under the executiv ability of the Clevelands, the Bayards, Mannings, Harrisons, Wanamakers, Millers, Goulds, and Vanderbilts? Or, to cover the whole at once, how long will the people pay this enormous tribute to the American banditti?

I will do anything I can, at any time I can, to help you, for I know you are helping me and all mankind. The paper is all right. I favor letting everybody in that will come in civilly. The preachers as a rule cannot come very civil at first, but let them come in; they will get civilized. I am in favor of admitting all discussion pertaining to the welfare of the human family, religious, political, social, and scientific.

I will send for both volumes of pictures as soon as possible.

Yours truly, E P. BLY.

Need "Washing Whiter than Snow" with the Hose.

EAST RANDOLPH, N. Y., July 13, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I am almost afraid to inclose you this $3 for fear some of Mr. Wanamaker's people will appropriate the same for their own necessities.

I hope, however, that you will receive the funds to assist you in battling for the truth. THE TRUTH SEEKER adds light. Your intellectual co-workers enrich your excellent paper by their jeweled thoughts, the very sunshine of their souls. Rich indeed intellectually is the brain that can feel the inspirations that thrill and delight coming from the world's ripest and ablest scholars, noble men and grand women who adorn the earth, and often hav I read the "Communications," the "Letters from Friends," each of which were well worth the price of your paper.

The Christians of this place still speak very disrespectfully about some of their neighbors, which fact is to be deeply regretted; and now, as we hav new water-works, the hose might with great consistency be turned upon some Christians, and it is possible their souls might be "washed whiter than snow." We do wish that the Christians who pretend to be so good would prove their goodness by paying us what they justly owe us, borrowed money, and pay us what they owe us for work. Then we could hav more confidence in them, and surely we could call them honest; but now we pity them.

Truly, R. R. JONES.

"Total Disability" to Speak Truth.

STAPLES, MINN., July 24, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I send you herewith an extract taken from the National Tribune, Washington, D. C. Why, oh, why did not "O. S. B." enter the Chicago Blade freak contest? He would most certainly hav won the prize. Modesty, perhaps, prevented him, as it would hav been necessary for him to sign his name. No doubt he could substantiate the truth of the story, as there was "an Irish regiment"—mostly good Catholics, no doubt—who witnessed the occurrence. Uncle Sam should hav a medal struck for him, for undoubtedly he is the champion liar of either army. He should hav a pension also. So far as telling the truth is concerned he can prove his "total disability." Did his nurse accompany him to the war, with his cradle and rattle-box, and sing Mother Goose's melodies to him to lull him to sleep? Did the government furnish him a canteen; or was it a nursing bottle?

D. C. JENKINS.

A MIRACLE.

Editor National Tribune: In the fall of 1862 the Federal army occupied the country north of the Rappahannock, the Confederates the south. All who were there and still liv remember the grand band concert, each side playing alternately—first Yank, then Reb. It was an immense musical throbbing pulsation of tune. It was noticed while the bands were playing that thousands of snakes, frogs, toads, and reptils, all species nativ of that region, had congregated in the open space along the river and in rear of the camps, apparently charmed by reason of the music. They still lingered at the close of the concert, the spell being still on them. Nearest the dense throng of reptils was an Irish regiment, and the leader of its band called attention to the motley crowd of reptils, saying: "Bys, gist see how quick we can make them varmints skedaddle." He signaled to his band, the orchestra struck into the stirring melody "Saint Patrick's Day in the Morning." They played it strong and thrilling, and as the music was floating in space, the drum-major shouted, "Look there," pointing in direction of the reptil crowd. Every snake, frog, and toad had disappeared, but the other species still remained, in anticipation of more music. This demonstrated the expulsion of reptils from the soil of Ireland by the donghty St. Patrick. The drum-major declared that the very name of St. Patrick was enough to rid the vicinity of these pests. The demonstration convinced us of the fact that the name of that saint is all-potent.

I was informed by a Rebel officer later that the effect was the same over on their side. He said the running away of the snakes, etc., was noticed soon after the St. Patrick's music began; the men clapped their hands and shouted, "See what these Irish Yanks hav done; driven every snake and frog from the field." Ten thousand throats lifted up their voices in one prolonged shout, which went thundering to the placid Potomac, "Saint Patrick forever!" St. Patrick was a gentleman, and performed miracles, as did his predecessor, Jesus of Nazareth.—O S B., 4th Mich., Second Brigade, First Division, Fifth Corps, Adrian, Mich.

"A Correct Silver Dollar."

MOUND CITY, KAN., July, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I notice by your TRUTH SEEKER of July 25th that you do admit into your columns the discussion of economic questions. The article by T. W. C., of Tecumseh, Neb., I fully indorse. Also the one by "Holt" on the A and B of money. No one can deny the facts and principles therein laid down.

"Declare the real money to be the only lawful money and one dollar paper will always equal one hundred cents." By which I suppose may be meant the legal tender unit of value, as in the greenback, but without the exception clause placed upon it in order for the bondites and goldites to speculate on them. Monometalism is a delusion and a snare. In proof of this I offer J. G. Hertwig's long communication from Washington, D. C., under the heading, "A Correct Silver Dollar." I read it with dismay, as I hav several others of like tenor—not as against Mr. Hertwig, but as against that conspiracy that inveigled our government into those entangling alliances with the pioneers of capital as against labor as capital in this country, and from which a mighty struggle must follow to extricate us, thanks to Mr. Hertwig. And the repeal of those financial laws must inevitably follow before equality before the law can be resumed by the people of the United States. That gold was appreciated, its value enhanced, and silver demonetized by design, is very apparent—in order to make money scarce, and thus increase its purchasing power, its interests, and its profits, compelling its unequal distribution. Prices of products and commodities and real estate declined in the same ratio, or nearly as the appreciated value of the single metal went up. Protection favored monopoly instead of labor. Falling prices were the result of contraction instead of the result of tariff laws, which hav been so illusory to the partisan and ogling politician. The money powers of Europe, England, and the United States conspired for the profits of their vast wealth, and sought and found a pliant tool in the presidential nominee of 1868 and the acts of 1869 and 1870 by our national Congress appreciating gold alone, thus repudiating the currency contract, changing the public debt into long-time bonds, without cause but unholy greed. It was an act of damning infamy. Labor was thus and then deprived of its equal share and rights under the otherwise benign laws of a republic. Years elapsed before the common people of the nation began to find out the grandest cheat of any age or nation. And now, again, the virus of politics by command of the money power over both the old political parties is being scintillated by partisan press and demagog to mislead and blind the eyes of the voter to keep within old party lines, that the gigantic fraud may be still upon the national statute-book or laws of Congress. When reasonings like Hertwig's resound through the land about the correct silver dollar, we might rejoice with plutocratic fervor were all the people on that side of the question and living on idle money with incomes fixed by law and contributed from labor and blood and toil of honest men. We opine that Mr. Hertwig will be corrected.

The Effect Seen in the Church's Confusion.

ROCK GROVE, ILL., July 27, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I would preface by remarking that I claim to be an original patron of THE TRUTH SEEKER, having taken it from the very first start when D. M. Bennett issued it at Paris, Ill., and without a single break having taken it to July 1, 1891. Being now in my eightieth year, I hesitate a little to renew my subscription, but I suppose I cannot break off at once, so I must taper off by degrees. In my early childhood I learned to read the English and German languages, and was a persistent reader all my life, and, by nature a skeptic, could believe nothing that I could not test with some or all of my senses, and then digest with my faculties. Outside persuasion could not reach me at all, unless I could test the subject with my senses. So you will readily see I could be nothing else than a Freethinker.

I think D. M. Bennett started right, and you followed with good effect in the same line, that is, to kill superstition. The effect can readily be seen in the terrible confusion of all the churches as to their creeds and dogmas. They are now in a perfect whirl. They now seldom dare use their scarecrows, devil and hell. They are now in a coaxing humor, and allow almost anything to pass, so they are only supported. Heston's pictures are a splendid auxiliary to show off the thing to the eye of the non-reader. Spiritualism, especially the phenomenal part, is a trump, for the senses take hold thereof. D. M. Bennett, before he died, after investigating it declared it a truth. The bottom of it all is mesmerism, somnambulism, psychology, hypnotism. The best starting-point in the whole philosophy is individualism—the conscious feeling of I am and no other person, which never changes through the whole life. This is positiv proof that the soul, the inner individual, is entirely independent from the body, as shown in our dreams. Everything in nature changes constantly, but this individuality, that I, never changes. I think this is a bone to pick for the Materialist and Atheist. Spiritualism in 1848 came with the alphabet in its hand, and it came to stay for all time; not by anybody's condition, of course not, but by its own condition. Why not? I could defeat almost anything by destroying and substituting conditions. Fraud? Yes, of course there may be fraud in it. If there was not it would not be of man. There is or may be fraud in all things. But that is no sign there is no genuin. All fraud must hav a genuin basis to ride on. Avoid it and seek for the true object. I shall avoid saying what convinced me of the thing called Spiritualism, for I do not want to turn preacher and persuade a person into it. Let anybody investigate till he sees and hears the thing himself, then he knows for himself. By persuasion, never. I would liken it to a thunder and rain storm. You see the dark clouds, the lightning dart, hear the thunder roll and rain fall. Is there anyone to doubt after viewing and hearing such a spectacle? Just so with Spiritualism, only millions of times more pleasing to the human mind. A person must not only hav an iron, but the hardest kind of a steel, nerve, if he can enjoy the pleasures of this life one moment if he really is convinced that when his body dies, which may be at any moment, his germ or soul is likewise annihilated or utterly destroyed for evermore. Horror and dismay!

SOLOMON FISHER.

Fiat Money Advocated.

ELYSIA, NEB., July 1, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: In THE TRUTH SEEKER of June 13th I find some comments on the People's platform, made by R. G. Ingersoll. He says that he does not believe that the government can make money by law any more than it can make good crops by law. If that is the case, then our soldiers hav never been paid, for they were paid in money made by law, with an exception clause in it that depreciated its value more than one-half. If money cannot be made by law, then we hav no money in the United States, only that which is counterfeit, for all good money is made by law. Gold, silver, copper, and iron are commodities out of which pagan nations used to make money, and our government has made some money out of gold and silver, but it has to be done by law without the stamp of the government. Gold and silver is not money, but a commodity of value like corn and wheat. When the people become more civilized, they will not use gold and silver to make money, because they are too scarce and hard to obtain. There is not enough gold and silver in the world to pay the debts of the United States. I would respectfully ask the colonel, if the government cannot make money, who and what can? Can he do it without becoming a counterfeiter? I also ask him, what is money? Is it property? is it value? or rather is it not a representativ of value, a medium of exchange? If a man had all the money in the world, and could not exchange it for something else, it would not be of any value to him. The colonel asks a question. It is: If the government can make money, why should it collect taxes? Why not make what it needs, and stop bothering the people? I will ask him a question, and then answer his. If the government cannot make money, why does it issue or make money for the banks? Why not let them make their own money if they can make money? And further, if money is only a medium of exchange, a representativ of value, what power can better make it than the government, which represents all the value we all hav? As to the answer to this question, I will say, yes, the government can and should issue money to pay all taxes and expenses, until it has issued a sufficient quantity for a medium of exchange, until there is money enough in the country to do the business of the country. And when it has done that, if there is not enough to pay expenses, which there would be if the government was honestly administered, then let it levy a tax. Not that government money would not be good for all expenses, but so as not to too far expand the currency. Now, colonel, I hav answered your question, and I will ask you some questions. Are you in favor of the people or the bosses that rule them? If you are in favor of the people, then you know that the great majority are heavily in debt. It has been estimated that we are in debt—state, national, and individual—about $25,000,000,000. The interest alone on that amount at ten per cent would be over $400 per capita. You know that there is not enough gold and silver in the world to pay that debt, and if the government cannot issue money, how will that debt ever be paid? Should the mortgages be closed and three-fourths of the people be turned out beggars? Colonel, I hav read all your speeches that I could get, and with the exception of the finance question I hav generally agreed with you. You hav been the great cause of the destruction of old superstitions. Will you spoil it all by opposing the people in their deadly struggle for their rights? What could we hav done in the late war without government money? A man's note is good so long as he does not issue more notes than his whole possessions are worth. So the government's note is good until it issues more notes than the whole nation is worth, and there is no danger of that. Now, colonel, you know that with a large circulation of money, times are good, prices high, debts easier paid. Then let us stop the banking system that has drawn and does draw interest from the people; has already drawn so much that we are mostly paupers. And let the government issue money direct to the people on good security, without much interest; and let it pay all government expenses in greenbacks, and if there are four billion issued, it will not impoverish the government; for it is worth many billions of dollars. Then away with the gold and bond basis for money.

JOHN BRYAN.

The Currency Question.

MADISON, WIS., July 28, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Will you giv place to some comments on the currency question that Mr. J. G. Hertwig's communication of July 25th seems to call for?

There is an apparent misconception as to the cause of the fluctuation in silver bullion. That misconception grows out of an education imbibed from treatises of bankers whose science consists in the keeping the people in ignorance in regard to their business. Now, to study the finance question successfully we shall first hav to find what the bankers' interest calls for. We shall see at a glance that it is that volume of currency that will yield the greatest amount of interest, hence the necessity of keeping it under their control, for a large volume of currency in circulation reduces the value of their issues, i. e., the interest on their issues. The bimetallic base is much harder to control than the gold base alone. The bankers are aware of the fact that both gold and silver hav and represent a double value. There is an intrinsic value, and a legal value, but it would be impossible to tell where the two values meet without taking the legal value from each by demonetizing them both by all the nations on earth. Had gold been served the same as silver was by Germany, England, and the United States in 1873, then gold would hav been as badly crippled as silver is now. A remonetization in Germany and England and free coinage here will restore it to its former value. Mr. Hertwig talks about gold and silver, stamped and weighed, as money the civilized world over. This is true; in part they are money, where government's fiat has made them such, but each fiat is confined to the nation that issues the fiat, and they are reckoned as bullion everywhere else. And I will say, fiats constitute the fluctuating propensity of silver at this time. The intrinsic properties hav not changed, but the legal hav. Again, they desire a currency that is fluctuating, for it is through this that their richest harvests are garnered. It was for that purpose that the third batch of treasury notes were dishonored over the counter of the treasury by limiting their legal-tender qualification by the exception of interest on the public debt and duty on imports, which caused them to depreciate more than once and more than one and one-half their face value as measured by gold. Through this instrumentality Senator Beck charged that the government did not realize over sixty per cent on the sale of their bonds, then paid gold interest of two and a half times the value of their bonds for a long time, say for six years, which would be equal to fifteen per cent on $2,000,000,000, which would equal $300,000,000 annually on the investment. Again, gold was enhanced by the demonetization of silver. But I hav no means of ascertaining the amount of that robbery of the people. But the credit-strengthening act, it was estimated, took $600,000,000 out of the treasury at one fell swoop, by increasing the value of bonds from a currency base that they were to be paid in to a gold base. Then the cremation of over $1,200,000,000 of our currency, reducing the volume to $700,000,000, completed the infamies which hav robbed the people out of more than $4,000,000,000 through fluctuations that hav been effected through the gold-base theory that is so fascinating to Mr. Hertwig. Bankers are delighted with the scholarship displayed in such essays, and the carrying out of his suggestions would afford an endless amount of fluctuations. Venice away back in 1070 established a bank on a national indebtedness growing out of a forced loan from her citizens, giving receipts for the money received and entering the same to their credit. This at first crippled their commerce. To relieve it the government negotiated for their claims by changing the credits from one to another, and finally issued a currency bearing four per cent interest and placing these loans to the creditors of the loans. These issues became the favored currency of that emporium of commerce and bore a premium of twenty per cent above gold for five hundred years. Our own demand notes of the first issues, amounting to $60,000,000 that was a full legal tender, maintained the same premium that gold did during the whole of our unpleasantness.

BROTHER SANDY.

We Should Stir up all Crystallizations.

CASEY, IA., June 29, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Churchanity is not the only evil or trade that is grinding the unfortunate, and it seems perfectly competent for you in your discretion to allow scientifically written articles on any subject which pertains to the well-being of the human family. When any party or profession becomes crystallized, ceases to advance, it then becomes necessary to hav heretics bold enough to depart from the book of tactics. In our religion, politics, law, and medicin we are nearly at a standstill. Surgery probably is advancing. Had Halleck had his way we would probably hav been speeding down the Southern hills yet, but Grant stepped outside of the book and soon had the dry bones shaking and the Rebels on the run. All our secular and religious periodicals can only talk of their trades. The corporations, professionals, and politicians down to all shades hav an advocate, nor will these advocates depart from their line even to do justice. Honesty seems to hav been bred and read almost entirely out of our minds and ethics. Fashion and practice, which hav been nurtured for the last two thousand years in Europe and America, do not recommend themselvs to the thoughtful. The contrast is too great in earnings. Perhaps the average of earnings could not exceed $250 for each laborer per annum. Now suppose we double that; only half would get employment. Make it $1,000; only one-fourth would get employment. The present official salaries, which are based upon the inflation period of the sixties and seventies, will average more than twice that in county, state, and nation, and our wise statesmen are increasing rather than diminishing them, in the face of the fact that merchandise and produce hav decreased in value nearly or quite half, hence these large salaries are but legalized robberies.

If we could in one year retrograde five hundred years, the people would take their medicin from the pulpit, recognize this order as divine, be content to starve, rot, and die for the sake of future glory. But of books and papers, of debates and orations, there seems to be no end. Illiteracy is the exception. People read, listen, and reason, and it does not take much logic to convince anyone of the injustice of heaping our servants with thousands by law, while the masses, the people, must be content with precarious hundreds. The Chinese call us barbarians, and not without reason. Europe and America with their vast wealth and sparse population hav too large a percentage of millionaires and paupers. To sum the matter, there are few of your readers that are able to take and pay for papers of all shades of opinion; and further, it would be an endless task to select from such a volume of rubbish such facts as the common student wishes to obtain. In fighting church encroachment you virtually hav to fight all crystallized institutions, viz., corporations, professionals, politicians, hence antagonize political parties. Statesmen such as Lincoln, Grant, Garfield, and Ingersoll can discern the line between facts and fallacies and hav the courage of their convictions, but there are few such men. Some are born blind; others are blinded by lucre or ambition. So it seems to me that in order to meet the requirements of your intelligent subscribers, you would better advance and discuss Socialism, Communism. As for Spiritualism, when we can understand electricity we can understand it. One is evidently as material as the other. We hav advanced so that we can utilize the latter, and when we become wiser we cannot only utilize but see the other. Mr. Sheppard's article on consumption was interesting, and as all we know has come from experience and observation, it was well worthy a place in your columns. Of course such articles may hurt the physicians' trade. But as you claim to be a TRUTH SEEKER, and as nearly all your patrons are in the same boat, you certainly should use all means in your power to sift facts from falsehoods, no matter who gets pinched.

A Rejected Manuscript.

MILES CITY, July 20, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: If you will allow the following article space in THE TRUTH SEEKER I will send a copy to the pious fraud named therein. It was refused publication here by the editor of the Yellowstone Daily Journal for the reason that it would injure his business, and by the editor of the Stock Grower's Weekly Journal, replying that it was too much of a scorcher, which shows what influence the church still retains over the minds of the people and how it would crush the liberty of Freethought if it was able. I did not giv the reverend dispenser of holy bosh half the scorching I wanted to, for the reason it would prevent publication, and thought I let him down sufficiently easy to pass, as I could not resist the impulse that something should be done to refute these absurd statements, which I made notation of while attending the lecture, hence the.

REPLY TO THE LECTURE BY BISHOP BRONDEL IN THE CATHOLIC CHURCH, MILES CITY, MAY 3, 1891.

This lecture consisted mainly of an account of his trip to the so-called Holy Land. To one endowed with an ordinary amount of reason and intelligence, with an unprejudiced mind and the required patience to listen to his arguments, it should teach just the contrary to what the bishop intended. It should teach one the absurdities Christianity is connected with and founded upon, and which are upheld by the bishops, priests, and clergymen of to-day. The first and strongest point he seemed to hav presented was this: he said, "There is one proof that outweighs all the reason Infidels can giv, and that is an empty grave"—referring to the grave he had seen in Jerusalem, which they told him was the grave of Jesus Christ. In regard to those people who told him, "it was the custom for certain tribes of them to consume a portion of their time in sitting solitary and weeping." I ask, where is the intelligent person who is willing to take for authority a people with such ignorant and barbarous customs as these on so important a question? Again, what proof is there in an empty grave compared with the proofs and evidence shown by the class called Infidels? It is not necessary to consume space here in enumerating them.

Next he said, "There were three crosses there, and the only way they could tell which was Jesus's cross was by touching one of them and it would heal the sick and cure all diseases." Everyone knows or ought to know that this is a falsehood and an imposition.

Again, he said, "The blood of Christ ran through a crack in the rock of the sepulcher and touched the skull of Adam, which Noah had dug up and put in the ark for safety until after the flood and then buried it under the cross." This statement is beyond all bounds of reason, and is too absurd for any sane person to think of believing. However, I will giv him credit for not asking his audience to believe this absurd story. But he said "they could believe it or not as they pleased," meaning, I suppose, they would not necessarily be consigned to everlasting punishment if they did not believe it. But he should be roundly censured just the same for scattering broadcast such abominable lies in the ears of the young who are apt to accept such statements for truth. I claim it is an imposition on the young for anyone to be allowed to preach such absurd stories for the support of any religion whatever. I believe the bishop was telling the truth so far as he was concerned in regard to what he had seen and heard, for I hav no reason to believe him otherwise than a gentleman of sincerity.

Again, he said he "kissed the ground before entering Jerusalem." When a person becomes such an abject slave to the dogmas of the Christian religion as to kiss the ground, I will state, with all due respect to the bishop, that he deserves some sympathy. Compare that kiss with the kiss from the dewy lips of your sweetheart or wife, sister or dear old mother, those whom nature intended for man to bestow his kisses upon.

The next item of importance in his lecture was when he was ushered into the presence of the pope. He commenced by making apologies for the pope, as well he should, for about the first thing the pope asked was where he was from, he replied Montana, and the pope did not know where Montana was. After making apologies for the pope's ignorance he proceeded to eulogize him as "the eagle that soars on high and sees all the topmost peaks." But he could not see Montana.

He made one good remark, "Man can do nothing better than love his fellow-man." He also made a few remarks about the magnificent cathedral he had seen in Rome. Nearly everyone knows there are many such buildings in Europe and America, used to advance the power of the Christian religion, and which cost immense sums of money. I want to state here that at no period in the history of the great city of New York hav there been so many people out of employment as there hav been in the past winter. There were thousands of hungry, cold beings wandering around the streets seeking the wherewith to obtain a mouthful to eat or a place of warmth to rest. And I hav no doubt but that the same condition of things exists, if not worse, in Rome. When we consider the sad accompaniments to these facts, in connection with the lavish expenditure of vast sums of money in the erection of magnificent cathedrals and churches in behalf of the Christian religion, we marvel at the indifference of those who can relieve the poor. How much better, and what a world of good it would do, and how many hearts and homes would be made happy, if these immense sums of money were given even to the thousands of the people of our metropolis, who are clad in rags and bound in the degradation of poverty and want. Reader, stop and think, what were you endowed with reason for, if you were not to use it and follow its convictions? What would you think if the bishops and clergymen were to teach you that it is wrong to use one of your limbs or one of your senses, the same as they forbid you to use your reason, the noblest and most important part of man's being, and that if you follow the convictions which your reason teaches you will be eternally damned for it? Such is the infamous doctrin taught in this advanced and enlightened age. But in the mean time, to quote the famous writer, Thomas Paine, "Every man has a right to express his own opinion." I believe the bishop's lecture teaches one some of the ignorance and superstition Christianity is connected with and founded upon. I leave you to judge of the comparison between the teachings of the Christian religion and the teachings of reason, investigation, science, and nature.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for his Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Dewdrops.

The rising sun found the earth wet with dew,
His noontide glow bids it fade from view;
But when the sun sets and the stars draw near.
The sparkling dewdrops again will appear.

Welcome, O dew, in your miniature shower!
You moisten the sun-parched lips of the flower,
You quench the thirst of the growing corn,
Eve's withered grass blades look fresh in the morn.

Birds and bees at your tiny fountain drink,
The dust of the highway you cause to sink.
May the atmosphere, earth, be kind to you,
And giv you each night its baptism of dew.

GEO. J REMSBURG.

We Thank Thee for Hell, Merciful God.

Is it Infidels they're damning
And infants that they're cramming
Into hell?
Are the noble fellows groaning,
And the sweet babes wailing, moaning,
Down bel w?

But, ah! where is this child's mother
And where is that maid's lover,
Tell me, pray?
Are they in God's land of pleasure
While these suffer beyond measure
In this hell?

Is the mother sweetly thinking
While her babe in hell is drinking
Of its fire?
Is the lover lowly kneeling
Without thought or bitter feeling
For her pain?

Ah! you would see that mother turning
To where her child was burning,
'Tis only love.
You could hear that lover praying
To seek his love, and staying,
Bear her pain.

But the groans of hell are dying,
And the infants that were crying
Sleep in peace.
And the lover, sadly, slowly
Turns from that green grave, lowly,
With its flowers.

We are content to thus be lying
With tall trees above us sighing,
Sweetly, low.
With sweet flowers above us growing,
And friends our good deeds knowing,
Let us lie.

Biographical Sketches.

3.—SHAKESPERE.

William Shakspere is undoubtedly one of the greatest poets of this age. You hav all heard something more or less about him. And how some people are trying to prove him a myth, a nom de plume for some other writer. Of course, if there is no such person this sketch will not be true, but I will giv you as much of the truth as I can. His birthplace was situated at Stratford-on Avon, Warwickshire, and it is supposed that he first beheld the light of day on the 23rd of April, 1564. His father was nothing very extraordinary, a yeoman or farmer. But his mother is supposed to be of more distinguished origin. They were very poor, and William was sent out to earn his living at the age of fourteen.

There are several stories tradition hands down to us about his conduct while a young man among the "hail-fellows-well-met," but as in those days it was thought that every young boy could never become a man until he had "sown his wild oats," I will not record them here. At a free grammar-school he received his education. He married at the early age of nineteen Anne Hathaway, a woman eight years his senior. It seems that even Shakspere, the immortal, was not spared the humiliation and trouble that some people hav the ill-luck to encounter. Taine givs us an interesting account of Shakspere's experience in a cheap theater. Of his degrading work he says:

"He was a comedian, one of 'his majesty's poor players'—a sad trade. . . . the brutalities of the crowd who would not seldom stone the actors, and by the severities of the magistrates, who would sometimes condemn them to lose their ears. He felt it, and spoke of it with bitterness:

"'Alas, 'tis true I hav gone here and there,
And made myself a motley to the view,
Gored mine own thoughts, sold cheap what is most dear.'"

This was taken from a sonnet of Shakspere's. Of his personal character and disposition I will quote what Taine says of it and let you form your own conclusion:

"His was one of those delicate souls which, like a perfect instrument of music, vibrate at a single touch. This fine sensibility was the first thing observed in him. 'My darling Shakspere,' and 'Sweet swan of Avon,' these words of Ben Jonson only confirm what his contemporaries reiterate. He was affectionate and kind . . . he was loved; men were delighted in his company. His wit in conversation was ready, ingenious, nimble; his gayety and his imagination fluent, and so copious, that, as his friends tell us, he never erased what he had written."

It does sound pitiful to think that this brilliant writer has been cut down to a poor, ignorant fellow, who could not even write his own name. He died on his fifty-third birthday, the 23rd of April, 1616 I will giv you a short quotation from one of his best dramas, "The Merchant of Venice." I hope you all hav it in your libraries.

"How sweet the moonlight sleeps upon this bank;
Here we will sit and let the sounds of music
Creep in our ears; soft stillness and the night
Become the touches of sweet harmony."

IDA A. BALLOU.

The Father's Return.

Ralph Emery and his little sister Rena attended the public school. Their father was supposed to be drowned at sea, as the ship was lost in which he last embarked, and he was heard from no more. Through some dishonesty and trickery of others their property was lost, and Mrs. Emery was compelled to labor hard to support herself and little ones, and was unable to clothe them as nicely as she wished, yet they were never ragged or dirty. I am sorry to say that in consequence of their thin, old, and often-patched clothing they were much ridiculed by the scholars.

At the time of which I write, the school had just closed for the day, and the children had not yet left the playground.

"Who ever heard of a boy wearing a winter cap in the summer?" said Johnnie Reignolds, pointing to the one worn by Ralph.

"Oh, hullo, cap! here goes!" cried Fred Billings, snatching it from his head and tossing it in the air.

"Here it goes again!" screeched another boy, "capital ball—catch it, boys, and giv it another toss."

"Oh, please do not tear my brother's cap," pleaded Rena. "Mamma will buy him a hat as soon as she can. See, you hav torn it already."

"See, you hav torn it already," mimicked first one, then another.

"Here," said Walter Whitman, snatching the sun-bonnet from Rena's head, as Fred had snatched the cap from Ralph's, "here, wrap the pretty thing in this bonnet. Here goes! catch it, Rob, and send it back again."

"Oh, boys, I wouldn't do so," said Arthur Day, a dark-eyed Liberal boy (the others were Sunday-school scholars) with a high and noble brow. "It is wrong and wicked to torture anyone just because they are unable to dress as well as we do. Come, giv them their things, and we will play something else. Don't cry. [This to Ralph and Rena, who were sobbing bitterly.] I will giv you one of my hats, Ralphie, and my sister Minnie will giv Rena one."

A well-dressed, handsome, finely formed man carrying a large satchel in his hand, stopped just now and watched the boys at their cruel sport, which they checked as soon as they saw him.

"Can one of you tell me where Mrs. Emery livs?" he asked.

"These are her children," replied Arthur, putting an arm around Ralph, "and they will show you; but first please ask the boys to giv them their cap and bonnet."

"Is it their things they are making so merry with?"

"Yes, sir."

"Here they are," said Walter, reaching them toward Ralph.

"They do not need them," said the gentleman, "but you seem to need them much for a ball, so I present them to you for that purpose."

While speaking he opened his satchel, which was filled with both useful and beautiful things, such as a very rich person might purchase for presents to loved ones, and taking therefrom a beautiful gold watch and chain, put it in Arthur's hands, saying: "This is a very slight token of the regard I feel for one who is kind to the poor, and supposed fatherless. I am their father, and was not drowned at sea as supposed, but saved by a passing ship. My wife, it seems, was compelled to move from where I left her, and I hav not learned until now her location. Circumstances hav made me a rich man, and my wife will no more toil for others, and my little ones shall be no more abused by cruel, malicious boys, who are not endowed with even sufficient gentlemanly qualities to treat a helpless little girl politely."

SADIE ATHENA MAGOON.

Christian Charity.

DEAR FRIENDS: I called a few days ago at a "Retreat for Aged Women and Children," a Christian institution, in company with MRS. Smith, an Infidel lady.

Though a cool, pleasant day, the house was closed in the most unpleasant manner, the inmates complaining bitterly of exhaustion, difficulty of breathing, and death-like feelings.

Wretched fragments of breakfast were to be seen, which I am told is their only meal, although a small weekly allowance would hav kept the wolf from the door.

I saw ladies wearing diamonds dashing about the house, making it impossible for the poor women to attend to anything useful, or get away to the little business affairs, which they were forced to neglect. The most frivolous charges were brought against them, giving them a look of pain and unrest which it was pitiful to see.

To giv the house and rooms an elegant appearance was all that was thought of; also these miserable persons were blamed for what their keepers had done.

Cruel rules were enforced, which prevented them from attending to their work. Their clothing was ragged, misery written upon their faces.

Mrs. Smith, Infidel as she is, handed $5 to a suffering lady (all she had with her), promising to relieve the others soon.

A pleasant drive, for one at a time, will also be a decided improvement. All this not many miles from a large city. ALHAZA.

Lexington, Ky., July 26, 1891.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. Price 25 cents.

Officers from Veile arrested the Jews and will undoubtedly send them to Siberia.

THOSE who were alarmed at the increase of negroes given in our 1880 census, 34.78 per cent, against 28.92 white increase, are reassured by the 1890 census, which proves the former incorrect. Instead of the negroes multiplying faster than the whites by nearly 6 per cent in ten years, the whites are increasing nearly twice as rapidly as they. In 1880 the colored stood proportionately to the whites as 45,397 to 100,000, in 1890 as 41,175 to 100,000. The negroes, therefore, are not holding their own in the competition, even in the region whose climate is best suited to their development. The natural increase of the whites is greater, for their growing preponderance is not due to immigration except in small part. They are the more enduring race even under natural conditions especially favorable to the colored people.

Gems of Thought.

WHOEVER believes the New Testament literally—whoever is satisfied that it is absolutely the word of God, will become a persecutor.—Ingersoll.

SIR RICHARD STEELE has observed, that there is this difference between the church of Rome and the church of England—the one professes to be infallible, the other to be never in the wrong.—Colton.

MORE or less consciously, the suppression of earthly desires has always been pursued as the chief aim of Christian dogmatism; the "world" has ever been the antithesis of the Christian kingdom of God, the "flesh" the irreconcilable antagonist of the regenerate soul. Hence that rancorous fury against the "worldliness" of naturalism, against the pagan worship of joy, against the modern revivals of that worship. Hence the grief of those "whining saints who groaned in spirit at the sight of Jack in the Green;" hence the crusade against Easter fires, May-poles, foot-races, country excursions, round dances, and picnics; hence the anathemas against the athletic sports of ancient Greece and the entertainments of the modern theater.—Oswald.

IT is difficult to point out a single nation living under a system of good laws. This is not attributable merely to the circumstance that laws are the productions of men, for men hav produced works of great utility and excellence; and those who invented and brought to perfection the various arts of life were capable of devising a respectable code of jurisprudence. But laws hav proceeded, in almost every state, from the interest of the legislator, from the urgency of the moment, from ignorance and from superstition, and hav accordingly been made at random and irregularly, just in the same manner in which cities hav been built.—Voltaire.

WHATEVER art there was in Europe up to the eighth century of the Christian era, was destroyed during the many religious wars that were waged between this and the sixteenth century, or was lost during the Dark Ages. The Arabs alone preserved the arts and sciences; and, when art got a chance of being brought out of obscurity into the light, it was to the poor Arabs we had to look for assistance.—Arthur B. Moss.

IMMENSE hav been the preparations for me,
Faithful and friendly the arms that hav help'd me,
Cycles ferried my cradle, rowing and rowing like cheerful boatmen,
For room to me stars kept aside in their own rings,
They sent influences to look after what was to hold me.
Before I was born out of my mother generations guided me,
My embryo has never been torpid, nothing could overlay it.
For it the nebula cohered to an orb,
The long slow strata piled to rest it on,
Vast vegetables gave it sustenance,
Monstrous sauroids transported it in their mouths and deposited it with care.
All forces hav been steadily employ'd to complete and delight me,
Now on this spot I stand with my robust soul.—Walt Whitman.

THE doctrins of evolution, in their main outlines, are now received by nearly all learned men, whether Christians or skeptics. The Bible says the world was made in six days by magic, man was perfect but sinned, Christ died to save a few, and soon God will destroy the world and punish the vast majority of men forever in hell. Evolution says the world is the product of a gradual development of matter, progressing through millions of years; man has arisen from lower animals, and they from inferior orders of animal and vegetable life down to the simplest atom. Analogy teaches that man will continue to rise, and, through the operation of the same laws, attain to a far higher, if not perfect development; for there must always be progress upward. So I hav changed from a pessimist to an optimist; and, instead of ignoring this sin-cursed world doomed to destruction, I accept it as "the best world going," and one capable of improvement.—Robt. C. Adams.

Notes and Clippings.

To the query, "What do you think is the reason of this aggressiv spirit toward Jews on the part of Russia?" Baron Hirsch replies: "It is a spirit of fanaticism. It is largely due to Pobiedonotseff, and is based on religious intolerance. He was the tutor of the czar, and has great influence with him. He is in the Russian church, and he represents to the czar that the Jews are undermining the people."

In France the progress of irreligion and unbelief is what is called "terrible." At the recent Catholic congress, held in Paris, the Cardinal-Archbishop Richard declared that in consequence of the anti-religious tendencies of the public schools and school legislature, more than one-third of the children in Paris who arrive at the proper age no longer partake of the first communion, and as a consequence cannot be regarded as members of the church, nor are they entitled to a priest's service in case of their marriage or death.

On the steamer Grand Republic, plying between New York and Brooklyn and Rockaway, the other Sunday the band struck up a waltz which brought four couples to their feet. When Captain Pease saw eight persons dancing the music was abruptly stopped. "No dancing allowed on these boats on Sunday." A young official of the boat said: "Our company is controled by influential Brooklyn church-members. You can bet that Sabbath-breaking on these boats will never be permitted. It was only three weeks ago that one of our best directors heard that dancing was permitted on the Grand Republic and the General Slokum on Sundays. He stopped it pretty quick, and it will be stopped for all summer." Very few of the stockholders of this corporation believe in Sunday outings for themselvs or their families. When the dancing on the Grand Republic was stopped a whisky and a beer bar were in full operation forward. Employees of the boat said that the bars were owned by the Company.

Ex-Senator Ingalls, says the World, while abroad will visit Palestine and thoroughly explore the theater of the great movement which inaugurated the Christian era. He is an Agnostic, but at the same time a close student of the Bible and an ardent lover of the poetry and philosophy that pervade many of the sacred books. In his famous tribute to the memory of Ben Hill, he offended many orthodox people by the views he more suggested than expressed with regard to the future.

ANOTHER INSTANCE OF PROVIDENTIAL NEGLECT.—See Page 533.

Those who hav suffered most from the Italian government, says the Catholic Freeman's Journal, "are the monks and nuns. Whenever the enemies of God aim at the destruction of the church, their first and fiercest blows are always directed against the religious orders. The reason is evident. The great religious orders of the church, with their vast numbers, their accumulated wealth, their wonderful disciplin, their learning and influence, their tried loyalty and devotedness to the cause of truth and justice, hav made them in all ages the strongest and most powerful bulwark of the church. Moreover, the pure and holy lives of the spouses of Christ being a silent rebuke to the unpious, render them above all things an object of hatred to the Atheist, the Freemason and the revolutionist."

"Where shall the next conclave for election of a pope be held?" is a question which is now being much discussed in Italian governmental circles. In following the evolutions of Italian policy since 1870 one sees everywhere the firm resolution to prevent any modification or displacement of the factors which compose the politico-ecclesiastical and pontifical situation in Italy and at Rome. The reason is manifest. Should any change take place the government would find itself confronted with an entirely new situation. This would be the unknown, and the Italian government fears the unknown because it believes that the existing conditions are the safeguards of its régime. The meeting of the conclave out of Rome would not only awaken in Catholic minds the idea that the holy see was not free at Rome, but it would also mark a new departure on the part of the papacy, the beginning of a new era. In any case it would render the future an absolute uncertainty. Were the conclave to be held away from Rome it would immediately bring the whole pontifical question to the front. The reopening of the question, morally and diplomatically, ecclesiastically and politically, as it would be reopened, is what Italy wishes to prevent.

The Reformed Presbyterian church has now suspended fifteen ministers for voting under our government. In 1806 a formulary embodied the usual declaration against all the governments which do not recognize God, Christ, and the Bible: "It is the duty of Christians, for the sake of peace and order, and in humble resignation to God's good providence, to conform to the common regulations of society in things lawful; but to profess allegiance to no constitution of government which is in hostility to the kingdom of Christ, the head of the church, and the prince of the kings of the earth. Christians testifying against national evils and striving in the use of moral means to effect a reformation should relinquish temporal privileges rather than do anything which may appear to contradict their testimony or lay a stumbling block before their weaker brethren." Acting under these rules, the Reformed church has always refused to take oath to the United States Constitution or to perform any civil act that would involve that oath. It has always protested against what it has called the "secular character" of the Constitution, since that instrument does not officially recognize the Bible or the Christian Sabbath, and does not require Christian qualifications in civil officers.

At this moment there are probably hundreds of murderers in Tennessee who hav never been molested. It is safe to say that among the ultra-pious neighbors who hav insisted upon imprisoning an otherwise blameless man because he kept his Sabbath instead of theirs, there are some who hav taken their guns to church and can look back upon feuds maintained by assassination.

The Doctrins of Paul.

One of the fundamental teachings of Paul was expressed in the declaration that "Jesus had risen from the dead," and ascended into heaven, and would one day return to establish a perfect kingdom upon a regenerated earth.

In 1 Thess. iv, 16, 17, we find Paul expressing it in this way: "The Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout; with the voice of the archangel and with the trump of God, and the dead in Christ shall rise first; then we that are alive and remain shall be caught up together with them in the clouds to meet the Lord in the air; and so shall we ever be with the Lord."

Although Paul believed in the doctrin of rewards and punishments, his general teaching on the subject was a great improvement upon the hell-fire doctrin of Jesus. (See Rom. ii, 5–14; also Rom. iii, 5–8, 22; also 1 Cor. i, 18–27; also Gal. vi, 6–9; and Phil. i, 27–30.) Some of the declarations of Paul seem to point to the fact that in his brighter moments he believed that God would ultimately save all mankind. As for Jesus he was the redeemer of mankind; he was the second Adam; and as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive. Paul did not believe in the orthodox doctrin of the atonement.

Matthew Arnold tells us that "Paul knows nothing of the sacrificial atonement. What Paul knows of is a reconciling sacrifice. The true substitute for Paul is not the substitute of Christ in men's stead as a victim on the cross to God's offended justice; it is the substitute by which the believer in his own person repeats Christ's dying to sin" (St. Paul and Protestantism, by Matthew Arnold).

A certain vagueness of expression in some of the alleged writings of Paul, such as the Epistle of Hebrews, hav led many to believe that he was in favor of the orthodox view of the atonement; but a profound study of all his sayings and writings will show that this is erroneous.

On Paul's doctrin of salvation by faith Dr. Janes makes the following acute remarks: "Throughout the later and more important period of its development the religion of the Hebrews made righteousness the foundation-stone of its spiritual edifice. The sense of personal sin, of the violation of the law of God, was ever present with the true follower of Judaism.

"Even the formalities of latter-day Pharisaims did not wholly obscure the strong ethical principle involved in the ancient Hebrew faith and preëminently emphasized in the writings of the prophets. With Paul this sense of 'the exceeding sinfulness of sin,' this striving after personal righteousness, was probably always present. In it, doubtless, lay the secret of his sudden conversion. In it also lay the root of his Christian theology. As a Jew, the escape from sin and its penalties had been possible only through strict and rigid obedience to the law. As a Christian emancipated from the law, he found the means of escape in the acceptance of the doctrin of salvation by faith. (See Rom. iv–viii, Gal. ii–vi.)

"Sin to Paul was something more than the negation of good, a mere phase of moral experience—it was an objectiv reality. It was an actual entity which obtained a lodgment in man and controled his actions in antagonism to all that was right—in antagonism even to his own will. 'Now then,' he says, 'it is no more I that do it but sin that dwelleth in me' (Rom. vii, 17). Paul had assimilated from the Oriental philosophies that doctrin of eternal antagonism between matter and God, between body and spirit, which is still more clearly expressed in the mystical dualism of the fourth gospel and reached its highest contemporaneous development in the doctrins of the various Gnostic sects.

"With this Oriental dualism he had combined the Hebrew notion of the inheritance of sin from the original transgression of Adam. He had also derived from the Eastern and Greek philosophies the metaphysical conception of the threefold nature of man, comprising body, soul, and spirit. He entified or objectified these metaphysical conceptions and they became to him realities" (Study of Primitiv Christianity, p. 196).

Paul's doctrin of the crucifixion was far from orthodox. Though he believed that a spiritual body of Jesus had actually ascended into heaven, he nevertheless frequently spoke of the crucifixion in a symbolical sense, affirming that he had been "crucified with Christ." Yet he lived, and "the life which I now liv in the flesh I liv by faith in the son of God, who loved me and gave himself for me" (Gal. ii, 20).

Paul then believed that it was only by being tried in the furnace of trouble and sorrow that one could get salvation through Christ. Indeed, he had suffered himself, and he seemed to think that only through terrible ordeals similar to his own could you work out your own salvation.

Lying Spirits and Spiritualism.

The editorial headed "The Spirit of Charles Bradlaugh," in THE TRUTH SEEKER of the 25th July, winds up with the words, "If the philosophy of Spiritualism be true, it is unfortunate that so many fools and charlatans represent it on the phenomenal side."

You will admit, Mr. Editor, that the world is, I will not say full, but very plentiful in liars, fools, and rogues of all colors and dimensions; and that they are constantly going over in troops to what is called the spirit world. Death is not a magician, nor a miracle-worker, that it can instantaneously change the characters of men, and convert those who are ignorant and wicked into intelligent and honest people. Men's characters, whether good or bad, are the result of long years of training. No man becomes good or bad in a day, a week, or a month. What is called death is simply an event. It is the moment of transition from one place to another. The ferry-boat that carries a load of passengers from New York to Brooklyn in twenty minutes makes no change in their characters. They are the same men after landing that they were when they embarked, and if they were all thieves, they would continue to practice their arts in Brooklyn without having experienced any regenerating influence by the transition from one shore to the other.

In like manner, death has no more transforming power over men than their birth had, and to me it seems irrational to expect anything else of that large crowd of liars and rogues who are all the time crossing over into the world of spiritual beings, than that they should continue to practice the same arts of rascality to which they were addicted here.

Taking for granted, therefore, that at the Birmingham séance a disembodied spirit did speak as reported, there is no proof either that he spoke the truth, or that it was the spirit of Charles Bradlaugh. It might hav been the spirit of one of those eminently religious liars in England, who, for the glory of God and the welfare of the established church, had been engaged for years in originating and circulating slanders on Bradlaugh, for no other reason in the world but because he did not believe in the popular religion of that country. Or, in making Bradlaugh say, "There is a God! There is a divine principle!" he may only hav meant him to say what multitudes of observing and thinking men, since the days of Spinoza, hav said to themselvs, if not to others, that it is matter, which, as Professor Tyndall teaches, has all the innate power to produce all the phenomena we see. A personal God, if he were infinit, would occupy all space to the exclusion of everything else, and therefore, whatever "divine principle" there is at all is inherent in matter itself. So that, admitting, which I do not, that it was Bradlaugh who spoke at the Birmingham séance, what he is reported to hav said is not a recantation of his life-long utterances.

We hav all got our muddy ideas about the future state from the church. It has been teaching the world for long centuries that the thief on the cross, who, at the eleventh hour of his life, repented of his crimes, was assured by Jesus that in less than twenty-four hours he would be with him in paradise. Upon this is based the hymn, still sung every Sunday by thousands of devout believers:

There is a fountain filled with blood
Drawn from Immanuel's veins,
And sinners plunged beneath that flood
Lose all their guilty stains.
The dying thief rejoiced to see
That fountain in his day,
And there may I, though vile as he,
Wash all my sins away.

Every pious murderer with a rope around his neck, after professing to hav been "plunged" into that fountain, and to hav washed from his hands the blood of his victim, expects to go straightway to heaven, and sit down on the same bench with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and to be treated for ever afterward as if he had never sinned at all.

But this is the very essence of superstition. The idea is utterly irrational and absolutely absurd; and countless thousands through all the ages of the past hav deliberately committed crimes expecting that if they repented of them at the last moment they would go to a heaven of infinit happiness.

I think all intelligent and candid believers in a future state of existence admit that the Spiritualism of to-day proves only one single fact beyond all question, and that is, that a man's existence is not destroyed by death, but that he preserves the same personality and individuality which distinguished him from other people here; and that, when the conditions are favorable, he can communicate his ideas in a limited way to those he has left behind him.

But connected with this fact, and growing out of it, there are a score of the most deeply interesting questions one might ask to which he would get no satisfactory answers. It is a matter of no kind of importance to me whether a man, after he dies, plays mischievous tricks, personates others like an actor on the stage, and lies, or drivels, or tells the truth. The burning question which clamors for settlement is: "Does he liv at all?" If he does, then there may be a way of explaining why he lies and misbehaves; and then, the ultimate fate of one man being the fate of all others, every wise person will aim to lead such a life of honor and uprightness on this stage of his being as will be sure to make him happy in the next; for the sterling virtues of moral excellence in this world would carry their fine qualities into all the other states of being, and make their possessors happy.

"The Way to Heaven."

A number of books with titles similar to the above hav been written; not one of them appears to advance a single step toward the solution of the problem of getting to heaven. Not one tries to tell us where heaven is, or attempts to indicate, on any geographical or astronomical map, the route to be taken or the direction to be pursued. We often hear the expressions "up to heaven," or "down to hell," but what do these phrases signify? If literally followed, these directions would lead the Americans and Chinese in exactly opposit directions, or would send us to look in precisely the same direction in which the pious missionaries tell the Chinese and Hindoos they will go if they are wicked and do not become Christians.

Books which profess to guide people to heaven devote nearly all of their space to telling mortals how to be good, how to love Jesus, how to support missionaries and other pious vermin, how to liv by faith and not by sense, and so on; but what has all that got to do with getting to heaven? David killed Uriah and went to heaven; Smiler, the Salvationist, killed his wife, and lived a polygamist like David and Solomon and good old Jacob, and went to heaven, so far as we know without repentance. On the other hand, Abraham Lincoln, Thomas Paine, and Thomas Jefferson were merely moral men like other Infidels, and can therefore never hope to lie in (the other) Abraham's bosom, or exchange salutations (except across the gulf) with that modern David of Jehovian Christianity, Martin Luther, who granted permission to one of his Protestant sovereigns to marry two wives, and said a man might with impunity commit murder and adultery a thousand times a day if he could only maintain an unwavering faith in Jesus. So what has being good got to do with getting to heaven? And as to the other things mentioned, they appear to be equally unessential. Faith had never taken anyone to heaven up to the year A.C. 30, for Jesus said, "No man hath ascended into heaven;" and no one has ever reached heaven since that time, for Jesus said of each one who should believe in him and thereby obtain eternal life, "I will raise him up at the last day," but the last day has not arrived yet.

Our Christian Spiritualist friends talk about a "summer land" (where flies, mosquitoes, and bedbugs never die—I like a little winter occasionally as a relief), but they do not read their Bibles, or they would know that their summer land can hav no human inhabitants until after the resurrection. "Joseph is not, and Simeon is not," and can Benjamin be found there?

So it seems to me the way to heaven is not yet opened. "The dead know not anything," and therefore cannot enlighten us, and the "living know that they shall die," but that is all they do know about "the great change called death." All of the literary "guides to heaven" are useless without maps, and no maps can be made until the route is opened.

What, then, shall we do? What did we do before we existed in this world? Did we hav to prepare for this life before we lived? Were "time, space, and opportunity afforded us in which to make our peace, calling, and election" to the responsibilities of the present life "sure?" If not, what reason (outside of the supernatural realms of no reason) is there to suppose that we are expected to prepare beforehand for the next stage of existence?

We read of Elijah's going up to heaven in a chariot (Jesus had never happened to read of him), and of God, Christ, and angels going up to and coming down from heaven, but we are never, I believe, told exactly at what time of the day or night the ascents or descents were made.

If there be such a place as heaven, and if it is located in any certain place, it cannot be either up or down from us, for there is no such thing as up or down outside the atmosphere of our globe. If a man were to die at 6 o'clock in the morning and his soul should take its "upward flight" to heaven, what direction must the soul take of the man who dies at 6 o'clock in the evening, when the earth has turned completely over? Religious people never make allowance for this motion of the earth. It is always "up to heaven" and "down to hell" with them. Is hell in the center of the earth, whence belch forth volcanic fire and smoke? Is the devil under the ground, and do sinners therefore trample him under their feet continually as well as Christians, without the help of Jesus? Is not saving faith necessary in order to hav "the world, the flesh, and the devil under our feet?" Is not that part of heaven to which the missionaries in China point their converts below us? Is not the heaven of the Europeans on one side of us and that of the people on the Pacific coast on the other side?

If heaven is situated in an upward direction from all of the inhabitants of our globe, it must necessarily encircle the earth. But at what distance does it surround us? Are all of the suns and planets higher than God's throne? Does the light of the sun first illuminate the angel bivouacs before it reaches us? If so, is there any man on the earth destitute of "heavenly light" whether he is a Christian or not? Who can help "walking in the light" then, whether he wants to or not? Those who hav the least faith in Jesus are as often found walking in this light as those who hav the most.

Is heaven within our atmosphere? So close, and yet invisible? Would it be too much trouble, do you think, for God to show himself to the people on one little planet when he is so near, or must we believe Moses and the prophets? Did he show his back parts to Moses? "No man hath seen God at any time." Then it is evident that heaven is not so near, after all, as our atmosphere. Neither does it surround any other globe, else it could not always be above us. It must be outside of the universe, beyond the infinit, located on some vast plane which is always up from everywhere. Experience teaches us that it is always easier to descend than to ascend, that the downward attraction is stronger than the upward; and it follows from this that, if it is always up from everywhere to heaven, there must be also a still stronger attraction in an exactly opposit direction, in a place which is always down from every place. The force of attraction, or gravitation, depends, as we know, upon the size and density of the attracting mass, and decreases as the square of the distance increases. This shows us quite plainly that hell must be either much larger or much closer than heaven. It is also a plain law of physics that a large body of matter must eventually draw all smaller bodies to itself when the forces which caused their original separation are dissipated into space. It is likewise true that a large body will attract to itself more of these scattered forces than a small one, and will therefore increase rather than diminish its strength as the scene of commingled atoms and forces rolls on to its conclusion. What, then, is to hinder the ultimate absorption of the up by the down, the small by the large, the light by the heavy, the immaterial by the material? No manifestation of force has ever been observed unconnected with material substance, and no proof of the power of the immaterial world to receive, preserve, or originate a force can be demonstrated. The boasted realm of the immaterial, so far as we know, is without force and without substance. Its immaterial phantoms cannot be expected to exist separately after the other bodies of space are drawn into the universal maelstrom, and it has no force to resist this ultimatum. If there be, in some place which has never been visited, an immaterial world which is unlocated and unlocatable, inhabited by Gods, angels, spirits, genii, phantoms, ghosts, hobgoblins, etc., which hav never been seen; and if this realm of immaterialities has hitherto resisted a superior force of gravitation which philosophy pronounces irresistible, it cannot be expected to remain when the accumulated masses of matter are conglomerated, and their now distracted forces united. To talk, therefore, of a spiritual state which is likely to survive "the wreck of matter and the crash of worlds," is an absurdity. Santa Maria ora pro nobis. What shall we do?

Just at the present time we are having a rest from the water-fowl Christians who deluged the people last winter, and are having a rain of brimstone from the fire-eating and smoke-breathing Free Methodists. They are encamped along the banks of the Neosho river, and expecting help from the Salvation Army. Their leaders are one Wilson, of revivalist notoriety, and Sherman, of St. Louis, who used to run a red-hot holiness paper with Ellis, another Free Methodist, but they loved one another so well that they could not work together long. This Sherman some six or eight years ago, in a camp-meeting campaign northeast of here, got very anxious to see somebody converted; so he knocked a man down, jumped upon him, and choked him until some one with less religious zeal interfered; and when asked why he did so, Sherman replied that it was not his work but the Holy Ghost's.

By dint of much wailing and agonizing they hav gotten a few children set crazy, a few fools who didn't need any change in order to affiliate with the crowd hav been captured, and one or two old persons. My father, who had been a Spiritualist for over twenty years, and is now eighty years old, was persuaded by one of his daughters to giv up his reason and go back to the bib and rattle-box. For one, I do not believe that Spiritualism is helping the cause of Freethought as much as it is hurting it. More than half of the Spiritualists I hav ever known are either dead or back in the churches. I was once led into the church myself by it. If I believed the Bible to be God's word I would be a Seventh Day Adventist; if I believed in the divine institution of an infallible church I would be a Catholic; but as I believe in neither, I am an Atheist—as Charles Bradlaugh once said, I hav had brains enough to take me there.

When father got converted he gave up his "World's Sages," etc., to the preacher, and the latter promptly put it into the fire. I can not blame him very much, for I burnt Professor Draper's "Conflict" once when I was in the same state (I wish I had the book now); but as Brother Heston says, "Thank God it is no worse," for I still hav Draper's "Intellectual Development of Europe," Bennett's "Sages, Infidels, and Thinkers," and several other works of that kind. But what Infidel ever went to burning up his Christian books as soon as he changed his mind, because he was afraid to read them? What Freethinker shrinks from hearing both sides—all sides? I hav now in my library nearly a score of standard Christian works—Butler's, Paley's, Joe Cook's, etc. I hav sold several, but will not burn any. Infidels don't believe in burning their enemies or their enemies' books. They may donner vetter and sacrament a little occasionally, but they don't mean any harm by it. They will even let Deacon Timothy take a little wine for his stomach's sake, if he wants to, Brother Shepherd.

A. H. DARROW.

Hartford, Kan.

No Anarchy.

Under this imposing title the Boston Investigator publishes a clipping from that false organ of monopoly, the New York Sun, and thereby joins the ranks of the fanatical political mole, that vociferates, "Crucify!"

It begins with the startling but self-complacent statement that "Liberty of speech is the right of every man in this country, but liberty of murder is the right of no one." A creditably informed editor would not publish such twaddle. Abner Kneeland mobbed, Lucy Colman hooted, Moses Harman sentenced, Ezra Heywood in jail, John Most serving a sentence, Pentecost prevented from speaking in Brooklyn and Colonel Ingersoll in Pittsburgh, Reynolds fined for blasphemy—these are the shining examples of liberty of speech. There are states in this Union where a competent man will lose his right to testify in court when by using his liberty of speech he states his unbelief in the existence of a divine Hocus-pocus. Women not being mentioned, it may be inferred that they enjoy the same priceless privileges, or else are not recognized as having any rights at all. Oh, yes, we hav the right to speak as we please, provided we please as the majority wills, or when backed by a minority large enough to inspire fear. But woe to the man who speaks his mind to the howling mob and stands alone.

"Liberty of murder is the right of no one." Oh, no; only the licensed professionals, the Pinkerton thugs, the soldiers, the militia, the policeman, the man-starving monopolists, the hangman and the roaster by electricity, are those that hav the liberty to kill—to kill in the name of law and decency, and to avenge imaginary wrongs done to that beast of beasts, "Bourgeois Society." And one more individual in this glorious, splendid freeman's country has the right to kill—to kill slowly but surely, with every refinement of cruelty titillating the nerves of the victim. It is the monogamic husband violating his wife's rights of person in the nuptial chamber.

"The miscreants that come here with bombs and dynamite must be dealt with in the sternest and most relentless manner." Probably because they intend to do as the privileged killers. An infraction of monopoly is a fearful crime in this free country. However, they are only accused of intending to kill those that do not please them. They are far superior to the professional, who kills not under the sting of hate, not under the burning but mistaken sense of redressing brutal wrongs by brute force, but as a hireling bravo for a weekly stipend of blood money. Which is the lower creature, "the miscreant that comes here with dynamite and bomb"—if ever anyone comes thus provided—or the Pinkerton detectiv who kills striking railroad men without provocation; the Catholic Paddy who, enrolled on the police force, exercises the monopoly of clubbing, arresting, and, according to the Twentieth Century, of burglarizing; the husband who premeditatingly commits murder in the first degree? Who, I say, is more deserving of being dealt with in the sternest and most relentless manner?

And oh, the truth of the language, "Where the crazy fools, who are advocating the slaughter alike of peaceful citizens and officers of the law, hav attempted to execute their ferocious purposes!" Has not the editor read the trial? Does he not know that neither of the hanged or condemned men had attempted to execute those purposes? Must I recall to his memory the mockery of the trial, the packing of the jury, the contradictions of the witnesses, the exclusion of the liberty of free speech, which occurred at that occasion and resulted in a proving to the minds of all disinterested men the innocence of the accused?

"They must be put down with the strong hand instantly, and afterwards those that remain alive must be tried and must hav justice, but no mercy." Well, it was done. These men, using their right of free speech and doing nothing else, were put down with the strong hand, and tried by American Justice, while American Mercy of the Boston Investigator type is afraid to liberate those she unjustly incarcerated. Deliver us from American Justice and American Mercy.

And a darling police is the Chicago uniformed mob. A citizens' rights league had to be organized, and a paper, the Personal Rights Advocate, published, in order to protect the citizens from their protectors. A doctor is murdered and his murderers are found to be affiliated with the force. N. B.—Those murderers were not hanged; they belonged to the killing monopoly. They were no miscreants that come here with bombs and dynamite; they were God-fearing Irish Paddies. American justice and mercy were meted out to them, and after premeditated murder saved them from death. The police captains, who were the leaders at the time the Communists were hanged, and one of the principal detectivs, had to be indicted for blackmailing and embezzlement; one captain dismissed, as also the detectiv, and the other only retained by powerful political pressure. A sweet-smelling lot those Chicago policemen—a crown and a glory to our civilization, and certainly very fit tools to be intrusted with the strong hand to put down Anarchy.

And certainly the Boston Investigator does well to cry out against people who do not want such government, or no government at all. But when the editor of the Boston Investigator was clipping that momentous piece of monopolistic claptrap from the New York Sun, and giving it his sanction by inserting it in his columns, was he convinced that it stated the truth? Was it the editor's honest conviction that "Anarchists are miscreants, who come here with bombs and the avowed purpose of killing those who do not please them?" If, after living long years in Boston, where the best occasion is offered to understand what Anarchy means, he is obliged to formulate his definition by clippings from the New York Sun, his only safe course is not to try it any more, for though the roar is deafening, and may deceive the ignorant, to the initiated it is painfully apparent that the lion's skin will not cover the tips of the ears.

DE LESPINASSE.

"Sacred" Property a Fraud.

J. Van Denburgh in Milwaukee News.

In Saturday's paper I find these significant words, "Free From Tax." Those are words full of big meaning and most startling significance. To whom and why is that freedom granted, and who are the privileged ones?

Is it the widow who by working hard sixteen hours out of the twenty four just manages to keep her half-clothed children from starvation; whose little cottage, chinked with mud to keep out the cold blasts, stands in the shadow of yonder tall and gilded steeple? Is that place which she calls a home, the inside bare and poverty-stricken—is that free from taxation?

Well, surely, if anything on earth ought to be that should. But it is not.

Why? Three lines under the same heading tell why. "The following is a list of the various denominations, the number of churches each possesses and their value estimated." Then follows a list of churches and values which aggregate over five millions of dollars.

Another inquiry full of equal significance—Who owns those churches? And why are they exempt? Do any poor widows with orphaned children own stock there? Folly to ask that question. Stand a half hour on the corner during certain hours at times and take a look at the people who do own all the stock in those favored institutions. And as they roll by in gilded equipages and outside liveried attendants, the not infrequently languid occupants and owners clothed in purple and fine linen and weighted with sparkling diamonds, ask yourself while looking, or anyone, if this kind of property and the opulent owners thereof should be exempt from the burdens of state at the expense of widows and orphans? The answer will be quick, sharp, and with emphatic No!

It is simply a gigantic and cowardly robbery. And more, no honest citizen, without ignoring the Golden Rule, can with a clear conscience say this characterization is too severe. The pretense that such is sacred property is an assumption and fraud. And that is the only reason given why it and its owners should be favored at the expense of others and then pretend to be the followers of that meek and lowly man who asked not and refused both money and scrip.

No comparison can be made. They are unlike as light and darkness, and their demands and acts prove them false.

Our Truth Seeker Consumption Cure.

Dr. Foote, Sr., devotes two columns in Health Monthly to an adverse review of the cure theory set forth by me in THE TRUTH SEEKER of June 20th. He does not question my theory of the status of consumption—only objects to the preliminary treatment, the "breaking up" process that I recommend. This he characterizes as "taking the patient too near to death's door." I cannot for the life of me see how the breaking up of morbid conditions can be taking the patient to death's door. I should say it was leading him away from death's door.

Action is life. Circulation is health. Congestion is death. If a consumptiv's organs of secretion and excretion are dead with torpor, it is bringing him from death into life to arouse and reanimate those dormant functions. It is like the breaking-up transition from winter to spring. There is no cure in existence so effectual for a "cold" as a good, well-executed "sweat," with internal as well as external applications. It relaxes the tension of the tissues, melts the rigidity of nerves, unlocks the icy fetters of congestion, breaks up the morbid conditions, and restores a natural and healthy circulation.

If this is taking the patient to death's door I fail to see it. The sweat route to health is the best, the safest, and the cheapest, but as it does not lead through the apothecary shop it is not held in favor by the old drug doctors. But I regard it as a "saving ordinance," a baptism that cleanses the sinner and brings him into vital relations with nature. So in the cure of ague—the morbid conditions first broken up—tonics to build up, afterward.

Weakness is not death. Muscular strength is no pooof of health. I knew a merchant who one day felt so unusually well and strong that he spoke about it, saying he never felt so fine in his life, but before night he had a stroke of paralysis from which he died. The "weak" ones liv the longest and can endure the most. The "strong" ones break off like a brittle reed. Why? Because your "strong" man is lacking in that willowy, fibrous flexibility that we call "nervousness," often an inconvenience, but after all a very desirable quality to possess.

I knew a man who bragged of his "nerve"—that is, his absence of nerve. I saw him at the death of a brother by consumption, and later at the death of his wife in her third childbirth. He never shed a tear. A sister-in-law upbraided him for it, but he told her that although he felt grieved he could not weep. The fact is, his nervous system was partially dead. His muscular system had robbed it. He could eat like a "leather judgment," sick or well, and ate a hearty meal at the table an hour before his death by consumption. His doctor gave him the same advice that Dr. Foote says he givs his consumptiv patients—to "keep off the bed." He kept off the bed, and as a natural consequence his muscular system kept right on robbing his nervous system till he died.

By the treatment I propose the lives of such persons can be saved. A man whose digestiv apparatus can extract no nourishment from his food is already at "death's door." His stomach and bowels may hav as much muscular, contractil energy and peristaltic vigor as a bench-vice or a coffee-mill. The mill digests mechanically but has no nerves to carry on chemical processes and extract nourishment from what it grinds.

To giv the nervous system a chance to feed and recuperate, the muscular system must be "laid off"—that is, weakened and sent to bed. Rest and relaxation are nature's first conditions to cure. Besides, what little vitality is generated, if any, should be conserved and applied to regenerativ, remedial work. Nature can no more repair a man while on the go, if in bad plight, than a mechanic can repair a wagon while in use. The place for a sick man is in bed. I do not call the righteous to repentance. If the consumptiv is not sick then is all my preaching in vain. But the truth is, they are dying all around us. Well men do not die. The consumptiv is one who is drifting smoothly and peacefully and hopefully into "death's door" as fast as he can go and as unconscious of the fate that awaits him as one who is freezing or dying by morphine. The congested nerves hav produced the "lethargy of death," and the unfortunate victim believes that he is all right and asks only to be let alone.

The man whose nervous system is so dead that it has not sufficient life or action to kick up at least a spasmodic rebellion and weaken him and throw him on his back and keep him there until repaired or regenerated is in a dangerous condition.

The re-borning or regenerativ treatment that I suggest for consumption is not an invention of mine but of Nature. I stole the idea from her. I peeked behind the curtains and watched her at her work of cure. I saw that whenever her children disobeyed her laws past the point of endurance she brought them back to vital life and union with her by pain, weakness, and so-called "sickness." She puts them to bed in spite of their efforts to the contrary. She hauls them onto the dry dock for repairs. That is what Dr. Foote calls "tearing them down" and taking them "near to death's door." Really it is a tearing down of the muscular mav, but per contra a building up of the nervous and vital man, a resuscitation of nerve life, particularly that part of the nervous system connected with the stomach and bowels.

Consumption is congestion of the nerves of the secretory and excretory organs. It is living death—death by slow degrees. The consumptiv on his legs is already at death's door; but "broken up," quickened with nerve life, flat on his back, he is beating a retreat directly away from death's door. For congestion is death. If Nature ever needs assistance it is in consumption, to "down" her patient, for that disease presents a peculiar condition of affairs. Nature's hands are completely tied. Her avenues of communication, her canals, ducts, sewers, telegraph lines, etc., all stopped up and out of order, her ammunition exhausted, her commissary department bankrupt, she is unable to arouse action, organize resistance, stir up commotion, incite revolution, or bring about a climax of any kind or character. She is like a person asleep dying by gas suffocation. She is bound hand and foot. Why not break her fetters and giv her a chance?

Prevention is better than cure. Persons of consumptiv tendency should use such foods, drinks, and tonics, and cultivate such habits, as are best calculated to develop nervous activity and promote nervous growth. Man is a nervous animal and has an extensiv and fine nervous organization and brain that needs to be well nourished. Hence the universal desire for stimulation—for tea, coffee, salt, spices, cider, wine, beer, acids, whisky, and tobacco. That desire is natural and right and should be gratified, but at the same time systematized into regular daily habits of moderation, like the desire for food, instead of being smothered out and extirpated.

A person who takes coffee at breakfast, soup and wine or cider at dinner, tea or beer at supper, and a moderate amount of beer between that and at bedtime, who on the whole takes from three to six quarts of fluid into his stomach every twenty-four hours, will never hav the consumption. And if he uses a little tobacco with all the rest it is not going to hurt him.

I am here reminded of a man Miss Leland met in her travels around the world who was forty-five years of age, plump, healthy, clear, soft skin and ruddy complexion, who had never drank a drop of water in his life.

A consumptiv is like a city short on water and with sewers stopped up and breeding animal life. Wherever there is stagnant, decomposing waste there you will find the maggot or the microbe. But they are our friends and not our enemies. Like the carrion crow, they are merely scavengers. The carrion crow will not touch live meat, neither will bacilli or bacteria harm living tissues.

What is the sense of all this "bug" hunting? The way to get rid of "bugs" is to get rid of the conditions which cause them and which make their presence possible if not beneficial. Flush the sewers; flush them thoroughly; keep them flushed. Keep the pores open and in frequent use. That is what they were made for. Use nourishing and mildly stimulating liquids freely. Drown out and sweat out the consumption and the microbes will go a-kiting.

Accelerate the circulation. Get up and keep up steam. We make our habits and our habits in turn make us. Vitality is as much a matter of will, of acquired habit, as of inheritance. It is like a man in a swing. Full motion of the vital functions means good vitality; feeble motion means low vitality. It is a question of action and reaction. The man in the swing can, if he knows how, and wills to do so, gradually work up a full motion from a feeble motion, or even from an apparent dead rest.

Weak, poor, unstimulating dietetic habits in persons inclined to consumption produce low vitality, feeble motion, and diseased conditions, and these diseased conditions invite parasites. Microbes are an effect and not a cause. Health and full vital action afford no conditions favorable to them—no stopping-place, no asylum. They pass by the healthy and take up their abode with the diseased.

Microbes do not cause consumption, popular opinion to the contrary notwithstanding. It may seem audacious to gainsay the wisdom of a world full of doctors, but really it is no more so than to deny the assertions of a world full of theologians.

If Dr. Pickens will look at my former article again he will see that I took particular pains to show that I was criticising the old orthodox medical and theological schools and not the new and heterodox. As men I like the doctors of all schools. My paternal ancestor was an M.D. and as good a man as ever lived. The music of pestle, the gleam of lancet, the spurting of blood, and the shrieks of turn-keyed victims of toothache are among my earliest recollections. I hav been among doctors a good deal, read their books, assisted them in their surgery, and as a dispenser of drugs for several years hav had considerable experience with them. They are good fellows, but unfortunately their business is one that thrives best where hygienic ignorance and superstition grows rankest.

The question of stimulation, of tonic aids to digestion, is a big subject as it is a prolific bone of contention. It is one of the unsolved problems. It is pretty clearly evident that the race has not yet learned how to make the best use of tonics. By tonics I mean liquors or solid extracts in solution. Tea, coffee, sour drinks, etc., all come under the head of stimulating liquids or liquors. Leaving abstract nonsense out of the question, they are practically liquid foods, and capable of bringing health and happiness to mankind instead of misery. The power of anything to bless is in proportion to its power to curse, if perverted. While many abuse themselvs by excess, others who stand in need of tonics abuse themselvs by abstinence. Fortunate is he who maintains the golden mean, who uses not too much or too little, who selects the kinds best adapted to his needs and uses them at the proper time and in the best manner.

The "saloon" is the product of teetotal fanaticism. The driving of tonics from the family sideboard and cellar established the saloon, with its adulteration and dissipation. The stronger tonics should be taken at meals. Distilled tonics are better adapted to morning use, vinous and acetic for the middle of the day, and malt or fermented for evening. It is a sin against nature's laws to go to bed on an empty stomach.

The bitter ales and beers are wonderful aids to digestion. If you will put a thin piece of beefsteak into a glass of lager beer and set it in a warm place the beer will of itself, without the aid of gastric juice, decompose or digest the steak in a few hours.

My ideal professional doctor would also be a hygienic educator, who organizes a hygienic church of two or three hundred people and contracts to keep them well for so much a year each, with perhaps a small forfeiture back for sickness or death. Once a week or month they listen to a seasonable sermon on how to keep well. The more the doctor educates them the less work he will hav to do. That is the kind of "meetin' house" that I would like to "jine."

I seek not disputation—only to set people thinking. Hygienic ignorance and apathy is the "crying evil." The gospel of how to liv should be preached from the very housetops. Hygienic education should be compulsory—should be a condition to marriage. Every parent—at least every mother—should be a competent family physician and nurse. Health and happiness should everywhere abound, and hygienic "righteousness run down our streets like a river."

Our London Letter.

Mr. Charles Watts met with a very cordial reception on his public appearance once more on an English Freethought platform, and strong wishes hav been expressed that he should again make this country his home. Were he to do so, it would be a great help to the party, as he is a keen and forcible debater and lecturer and receives a hearty and merited welcome wherever he goes.

Among the many excellent works published by Watts & Co. one of the most recent is on "The Practical Value of Christianity," being two prize essays for and against this religion. It is a capital work to place in the hands of a dispassionate inquirer. The supporter of Christianity rather overreaches himself, as most of his kind do, by claiming that all good emanates from his creed and all evil through disbelief in it. No doubt he has done his best for his own side and probably believes what he says, but he is evidently too emotional to look squarely at facts, and thus is at a disadvantage with his opponent.

A word-portrait of Colonel Ingersoll has recently appeared in the Echo, and as this is by no means a Secularist paper, the article may be considered a fairly impartial one, and very different to the usual description of the great American Freethinker that appears now and again in the religious papers. One paragraph reads: "He never by any chance insults or wounds any genuin belief, thereby setting an example which might well be followed by some of our bigoted so-called Freethinkers." The "bigoted" ones are not named, but as the Echo occasionally champions Mrs. Besant, and was some time back very indignant that she is not now received with open arms by the National Secular Society, the allusion is plain. The Freethought party is not so poor in numbers that it is anxious to claim everyone who formerly professed Freethought or may at some future time profess it. It shows wisdom on the part of the president to keep clear from all vacillators. The party has frequently had to suffer from being allied to those who are "all things by turns and nothing long," and will be all the better for having nothing to do with encouraging traitors in the camp.

The council for the erection of the church jubilee house are at their wits' end to raise sufficient funds to carry out their scheme. The cost of site and temporary premises is given as £56 860, and it has taken four years to raise £25,000, from which will hav to be deducted a large sum for advertising and office expenses. One paragraph in their standing advertisment is very amusing: "The council do not desire that the erection of the church house shall be restricted to members of the congregation and will thankfully receive and acknowledge the smallest sums." The assumed condescension and pertinacious begging contained in that sentence are very rich.

It seems that the late archbishop of York has not left his family as well off as they consider they ought to be, and so a subscription has been set on foot for their benefit. It is very evident they do not put too much faith in the inspired statement that "the Lord will provide" for the widow and fatherless. It is impossible to take up a religious paper without coming across several appeals to the pious to subscribe to some more or less worthy object (generally less); indeed, they are so numerous that the devout readers appear to pay very little attention to them, as complaints are often made that the responses are so feeble. Religion everywhere and at all times has an insatiable maw and is continually crying for more, but the cry is getting unheeded, as believers are getting fewer and fewer. If all those who were not church-members became avowed Freethinkers the church would not stand another day, but the army of nothingarians is great but indirectly supports religious creeds. It is perhaps just as well that religion dies slowly, for if it terminated suddenly it would be a serious matter to hav so numerous a body as the hangers-on of the churches instantaneously joining the ranks of the unemployed, and not being used to self-denial and poverty they would be most probably an extremely turbulent mob and the promoters of Anarchy. Dr. Bruno Wille, editor of Freireligiöses Sonntags-Blatt, is a very successful author in the line of Freethought literature.

There is trouble in Schleswig-Holstein, Germany, among the faithful. A strong and growing party rejects the inspiration of the Bible.

While it is not definitly settled where the International Freethought Congress for this year will be held, that of 1892 will meet in either Madrid or Barcelona, Spain.

A Secular revival wave seems to hav struck Sweden. Captain Thomson and Victor Lennstrand hav all they can do in attending to the formation of new Freethought branch societies. Such news givs us hope for the future of mankind.

The Anglo-Indian paper, the Times of India, states in a late number that of the sixty-four thousand pilgrims who in the years 1884–90 went from India to Mekka and Medina, twenty-two thousand did not return. They died from sickness or exposure or perhaps were murdered by their brethren in faith, the Arab-Bedouins. Such is the outcome of supernaturalism.

Through the courtesy of Mr. J. N. Malo, Caracas, we are the recipient of De Wekker, and in reply to inquiry made we will say that articles on the so-called prophecies hav from time to time appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER. We recommend "Bible Myths and Their Parallels in Other Religions" as one of the best works for the busy man who desires concise and conclusiv proofs of the non-original character of the Christian religion.

That church and throne go hand in hand is well known. Still, it is not every day that the ministers are so outspoken as was the Rev. Mr. Färden, of Norway, who at a recent meeting of the Norwegian branch of the International Peace Society arose and said: "Inasmuch as Christians should respect the word of God, they cannot believe in or work for the abolition of war." "I came not to bring peace but a sword," said Christ.

On August 18th the Holy Coat was taken out from its shrine behind the altar at Treves, and on the 25th the holy show will begin. A guard of honor will see that nobody appropriates the garment for disposal at a second-hand clothing store or otherwise. How strong the guard will be we don't know. The archbishop calls for fifty men, but according to the last news he had succeeded in getting only a baker's dozen. If the coat had been in this city, our pious city government would hav lent him half of our Irish police force. While we who are at a safe distance can giv our personal opinion about the nineteenth century humbug, it is not so in Germany. Editor Siwinna of the Kattowitzer Zeitung was wicked enough to print his doubt about the genuinness of the coat, and his convictions that the visitors were all dupes of the priests. The city court sentenced him to one year's imprisonment, but he appealed, and the Beuthen circuit court, which is composed of Protestants, thought only fourteen days was enough, and sentenced him accordingly.

Another Instance of Providential Neglect.

BLAINE, WASH., May 23, 1891.

WATSON HESTON, Dear Sir and Friend: I am a reader and admirer of THE TRUTH SEEKER, especially of the illustrated portion of it. I inclose you a clipping from the Seattle Post-Intelligencer of May 18th, containing a short account of two little girls lost in Nebraska. It at once reminded me of the poor woman found frozen in Dakota, whose motto was, "The Lord is my shepherd," etc. Such cases are stinging rebukes to the blind followers of an unreasonable, unmerciful Jehovah. With best wishes for your success, I am,

Yours for the truth alone, JOHN W. MERRITT.

OMAHA, May 17.—For a week the entire male population of Bedford, Thomas county, has been engaged in a search for two little girls of John Hammond, who were lost in the sand-hills surrounding the town last Sunday. The children, one eight and the other six, went to visit their sister who livs six miles north of Bedford, and about 5 o'clock they started home. They had to go about a mile and the road led through the sand-hills. The children lost their way in gathering flowers. The parents and neighbors searched the hills that night and Monday a general alarm was given.

Thursday at noon the youngest child was found where she had fallen, completely exhausted and half-covered with sand, fifteen miles from where the children left the road. The little one was unconscious. She was soon restored, however, and said her sister had gone home.

Search went on. It continued till this afternoon, when the dead body of the older child was found ten miles north of Dunning, Blaine county, fully seventy-five miles from where the children lost their way.

Mr. Watts to Stay in England.

G. W. Foote in the London Freethinker.

Since Mr. Charles Watts came over from Toronto a few weeks ago to see his English friends and lecture to his old admirers, he has been under constant pressure to settle down in his nativ land, where his platform abilities are more than ever needed. A great many letters hav reached me, too, as president of the National Secular Society, urging me to persuade Mr. Watts to remain in England. From the first moment I shook hands with him I gave him to understand that I should personally be pleased if he could see his way to work with me, but I refrained from pressing him, because I knew that his earnings in America were in excess of the income he would be likely to secure in England, where Freethought advocacy (I regret to say it) is worse paid than in any other part of the English-speaking world. There were, however, other solicitations in Mr. Watts's mind. He is not so young as he was, though still robust; he had a natural desire to spend the remainder of his days in the land of his birth; and his wife had always cast a yearning glance eastward to her old English home. Nor was this all, for immediately on Mr. Watts's arrival he was made acquainted with a certain offer from Mr. Daniel Baker, of Birmingham. Negotiations hav been going on since, and on Saturday I met Mr. Watts with his son, Mr. Daniel Baker, and Mr. G. J. Holyoake, at which meeting Mr. Baker's proposal was thoroughly discussed, and a rough agreement signed.

Mr. Daniel Baker, who has been for many years the mainstay of Secularism in Birmingham, and who has now reached the advanced age of seventy-six, is anxious to do something handsome for the perpetuation of the movement in that city. Accordingly he places Baskerville Hall, or rather the nineteen years' lease, together with £1,000, at the service of his intention. The Hall is to be conveyed to Mr. Watts by deed of gift. The £1 000 is to be assigned to certain trustees, including Miss Baker, Mr. Morley of Birmingham, Mr. Holyoake, Mr. R. O. Smith, and myself. Thirty pounds of the four per cent interest is to be paid yearly to Mr. Watts to defray the rates and taxes, and the balance to Mr. Baker during his life. The principal is to be invested in more commodious premises if Mr. Watts should ever find Baskerville Hall too limited; and if the enterprise should, from any unforeseen causes, come to grief, the trustees are to deal with the capital for the benefit of the movement, giving the preference of course to Birmingham. With the consent of all the parties, I am getting this trust deed prepared, and when it is thoroughly agreed upon it will be executed immediately.

Mr. Watts undertakes to reside in Birmingham and act as Freethought lecturer and organizer, with Baskerville Hall as his headquarters. He will not lecture there every Sunday, probably not more than two Sundays a month; half of his time will thus be free for the rest of the country, and I hope to see him one Sunday in every four at the London Hall of Science. He will hav Baskerville Hall rent-free, the rates and taxes will be paid (to the extent of £30, the present amount) by the trustees, and in these circumstances there is no reason why he should not achieve a brilliant success in the Midlands capital.

Before he begins operations there certain funds will be necessary. Into these I hav not space to enter. £200 will be required immediately, and another £200 during the next year or two. About £100 is already promised. I am sending out a circular to possible subscribers, but no doubt there are many whose addresses I hav not, and if this meets their eyes I hope they will contribute as promptly as possible. It will be understood that Mr. Watts is not begging. The money I refer to is necessary to the immediate and satisfactory carrying out of the Birmingham scheme, and I take the full responsibility of this appeal, although I may say it is heartily approved of by Mr. Holyoake.

Mr. Watts is of course extremely sorry to sever his activ connection with the Canadian Freethinkers. During the years he has labored in the Dominion he has made many warm friends, who will deeply regret his present decision. But they will respect his motivs, and they will doubtless reflect that in leaving Canada to resume his old life in England he is still wielding his sword in the service of Freethought.

Does Prohibition Prohibit or Not?

Senator Ingalls Two Years Ago.

Kansas has abolished the saloon. The open dram-shop traffic is as extinct as the sale of indulgences. A drunkard is a phenomenon. The barkeeper has joined the troubadour, the crusader, and the mound-builder. The brewery, the distillery, and the bonded warehouse are known only to the archæologist. . . . Temptation being removed from the young and the infirm, they hav been fortified and redeemed. The liquor-seller, being proscribed, is an outlaw, and his vocation is disreputable. Drinking being stigmatized, is out of fashion, and the consumption of intoxicants has enormously decreased. Intelligent and conservativ observers estimate the reduction at ninety per cent; it cannot be less than seventy-five. The increase in the number of internal revenue stamps sold by the collector from year to year is explained by the fact that they are required by all druggists, and many of them are repetitions and renewals for short terms. . . . One of the most significant and extraordinary results is the diminution of crime in the state. At the January (1889) term of the district court of the county in which the capital is situated, there was not a single criminal case on the docket. Many city and county prisons are without a tenant. The number and percentage of the convicts in the state penitentiary hav been remarkably diminished.

Senator Ingalls a Month Ago at Prohibition Park.

Nothing can be said in favor of the saloon or the sale and consumption of intoxicating drink. We hav wrestled with this subject for ten years in Kansas, and hav had organic and statutory Prohibition, and yet there is not a town in that state where a man cannot get all the liquor he wants. There is not an organized municipal corporation there whose expenses are not paid by the taxes levied upon the recognized and open traffic in intoxicating liquors. At Atchison, where I reside, the entire expenditure of the corporation, its police, its lighting, everything connected with municipal administration, is paid by the tax or fine or license fees levied every month upon those who are known by the authorities to be openly engaged in the sale of liquors contrary to the law. A similar condition of things prevails in Iowa. I can only express the hope that the projectors of the enterprise which you here hav in hand will succeed in enforcing Prohibition better than has been done in either Kansas or Iowa.

MILWAUKEE has lost one of the jewels in her crown. Dr. Juliet Severance has left that city and taken up her residence in Chicago, No. 2 Warren avenue, whence she will radiate and scintillate over the surrounding country. At the present time I find myself in Colorado, between Chicago and the coast. I will make arrangements for lectures and debates, beginning in Utah in October, having made arrangements with other lecturers to correspond with the Liberals of Iowa, Nebraska, Kansas, and Missouri, in which states I hav already lectured for years. I now want to see Utah, and Utah Liberals; then to the Pacific, which I hav never yet seen. Address at Mosca, Col."

Communications.

Past or Future?

When a boy picks up a piece of hot iron in the blacksmith shop, after being told that it will burn him, he is often considered a fool by older persons; but he is in fact not such a fool as he looks. He is an embryo investigator looking for truth; he is simply refusing to let somebody else do his thinking. He is of a bold, sturdy nature; he will do his own investigating and does not propose that others shall investigate for him. He proposes to think for himself. The boy who will take older advice and not pick up the hot iron is usually the puny-faced, sickly little fellow who has not the ambition to find out things for himself, and is willing to be told and to swallow what he hears as Jonah swallowed the whale, and as some of us swallow the story. Girls are more often willing to believe what they are told, and are proportionately less apt to be great inventors, discoverers, or leaders of reform. They are naturally timid, because less rugged and sturdy. Strength of body supports strength of mind, and many great minds lack the physical strength to develop their greatness; while sometimes a smaller mind backed by a strong constitution to giv it assurance, burns out in a clear brightness to its full capacity with a powerful energy. All hail to the noble spirit of the boy who so early in life refuses to believe until he has for himself investigated. He will make the coming man; upon him depends the progress of a world. We should never hav known of electricity if Benjamin Franklin had accepted the belief of his father. We should never hav known of the heavenly bodies if Galliteo had accepted in blind faith Moses's belief that the world was flat and rested on the back of a great turtle. And although Galliteo was burnt at the stake by the meek and lowly followers of the meek and lowly Jesus, because they thought him in league with the devil, yet the seed he planted grew in the brain of Columbus, and finally showed us that the world is round and by natural laws suspended and revolving in space. Do you suppose the boy Newton would hav picked up a piece of iron if told it was hot? Of course he would. He would know whether it was hot. He waked up and wondered why the apple fell in his face. Other men at that time would hav said in blind faith, "God knows why it fell and that is sufficient," and turning over would hav carefully fallen to sleep again. But such argument was not sufficient for Newton. His noble mind wanted a reason if there was one, and he found it. The little boy who picks up a piece of hot iron is an Infidel—that is to say, he will not believe without reason. Newton was an Infidel, because he believed that there was a reason why the apple fell—a reason outside of the will of God. Benjamin Franklin was an Infidel, because he would not accept the popular belief of his day, that thunder and lightning were demonstrations of "the wrath of God." Had he been killed during his kite-flying experiment (by what was supposed to be God himself), the telegraph and the telephone and electric lighting, progress and knowledge, might hav been postponed for centuries. The voices which spoke to our ancestors in thunder tones from the clouds, speak to us in a vastly different language. They cringed in fear before a God of wrath. We smile and enjoy the battle which the elements wage while nature is enforcing her laws for our good. Luther was an Infidel, because he would not accept in blind faith the teaching of the original Christian church, that priests must act between Christ and man and be fed by the dear people. And now what shall we say of Christ? Did he accept in fidelity the religion of the world as he found it? Was his fidelity with the church, or did he commence a great reform by banishing the priests and dove-sellers from the temple? Why, according to the story, we hav him disputing with grown men when he was but a child. Suppose his stepfather had turned the little Infidel across his knee and spanked all the Infidelity out of him and cowed his spirit into everlasting submission, would we still hav the Mosaic rule of God, watching in jealous wrath to knock off the head of every little first-born Infidel who pops up to giv the world a new idea? Possibly.

Ladies and gentlemen, I love the little boy who dares to pull the tail of a cat after he has been told not to do so. He deliberately takes the risk of two impending calamities. He knows that he may be punished by his fond mother, and he has been told that pussy has claws hidden in the depths of her soft furry paws. He refuses to accept the latter doctrin by faith alone and pulls the tail for results. He gets the results and is wiser; but it is not hearsay wisdom—it is not second hand intelligence. It is to him now fact, demonstrated beyond the possibility of a doubt. The little Infidel is now converted to his mother's belief in pussy's claws; so he will go through life investigating, and if he can find facts in his mother's religion sufficient to sustain it he will believe; if not, he will respect it simply because she believed it. What would the world be if there were no Infidels, no investigators, no independent thinkers, no heretics? What a mighty power for progress could the Presbyterian church be if, instead of trying its greatest men—its Dr. Briggs and its Dr. Brooks—instead of trying its brains for heresy, it should instead try its ignorant creed for total depravity! What would religion be if every year the church would cut off its tail instead of its head; get rid of its filth and scum and save only the pure, thoughtful parts! The link which now holds it to the supernatural, to the impossible, would soon be missing, and it would take its place among the useful institutions of learning, and instead of pulling down and degrading itself by denouncing as Infidels and trying for heresy such eminent divines as the Rev. Dr. Briggs, it would encourage and build them up; thus helping to drag the church from her dungeon of ignorance into the dawning light of the twentieth century. Despite the church, however, this is an age of enlightened reason, and her cruelty and boycott, to thinking people, is fast losing its terror. Her cry of Infidelity is now a brand of superior intelligence, which she fears and acknowledges by her ravings.

There are a couple of young investigators in a certain family I know of. I think I may say three, although one of them is a girl; their infidelity to their father is of such extent that they are not always willing to take his advice and methods without reasons; and he is glad of it. He is not bigoted enough to believe that they are less intelligent than himself. He believes they will be more so at his age. They liv in an advanced age, and if they seize the opportunities offered, they cannot hold themselvs down to his limited ability—limited by a less progressiv childhood. He is glad that his children are not satisfied to put their thumbs in their mouths and listen to his ideas and notions without question; and I am glad that he is not a bigoted fool to compel it of them. If he should tell them that the moon was made of green cheese, as people used to think long ago when the earth was flat and the sun revolved around it every day unless otherwise ordered by God—I think I will change that and say, by Joshua, so that I cannot be accused to-morrow of having used profanity without license—I say, they would wonder what was the reason he thought so. They would not believe it, unless reasonable—and might conclude that he had eaten too much of that article at the Temperance Billiard Hall. He could hardly blame them. He even encourages them in disagreeing with him sometimes on points which may be questioned profitably, and they often resolve themselvs into a committee of investigation, in which, I am glad to say, their father does not take a very prominent part, except, perhaps, in leading them into new fields of thought. They are not afraid of ghosts. They are not afraid of the dark. They are not afraid of Gods or devils, or hell, because they hav never been taught the hellish doctrin of total depravity. And he is not afraid for them to go to Sunday-school either, because, should an unreasonable assertion be made, they would question it. The work of the Sunday-school would stop right there, as far as they were concerned, until it was explained; or if it was not explained, and on scientific principles, their faith would be at zero. It would not do to say to them that Joshua commanded the sun to stand still. They would say, why, it stands still all the time. Joshua's knowledge of astronomy would be called in question, and be cross-questioned. I believe they would be so practical and pointed in their inquiry as to be irreverent and almost sacrilegious I believe they would question God's knowledge of astronomy, and wonder why he inspired the holy writer with such ignorance. So it is ever—where brains are allowed to develop, they doubt, that is, they inquire, want to know why, to find the reason of things. And I want to say to you, my friends, that if there is a God, he must be so different from the Hebrew God or any of the ancient Gods as to thoroughly detest a man who will not exercise his reason enough to at least try and arrive at truth. How he must pity a person who is willing to sit down in blind, depraved indolence, with an expression of resigned sorrow, and swallow all the contrary misstatements, bad astronomy, bad geology, cheap miracles, and altogether impossible statements of the Bible, as read and commented on by some of the narrow-minded and bigoted "ministers of the gospel," whose general appearance, narrow, low forehead, backed by large animal propensities, points, with unerring finger, to their near relation to the lower orders of creation.

Hundreds of times I hav seen those whom I knew to be intelligent listening to those whom I knew to be ignorant, and in a blind, dazed way believing what was impossible to be true. I believe if I were God, I would make a hell only for those who will not or hav not the manliness to reason—to use and develop the resources to which they can hav recourse—to cultivate the brains with which they are endowed by nature. I would create a plague with which to remove kindly, but firmly, all people who are not willing to investigate with their own minds—to increase, and not bury, "the talents" which they hold in trust. I do not think I would be enough Methodist to burn them forever, but would send them back into the world later to develop their brains in an age when intelligence shall not be boycotted by orthodoxy. Instead of throwing into hell the little innocent Presbyterian babies (whose parents neglected to hav them sprinkled with holy water prior to their demise), I would make them into little cherubim. I would giv them sweet little wings, and forgiv them; and would throw the Presbyterian synod, together with John Calvin, who made the Presbyterian creed and Articles of Faith, into hell, if I threw anybody in.

As I said before, I do not believe I would want a hell, although there are plenty of people just blind enough and ignorant enough to deserve its purging warmth. Possibly it would melt the scales from their eyes; it might soften their hearts a little in time and harden their brains. But all this speculation is useless, because I am not God by a large majority. I am not a candidate for nomination; and if I was a candidate, and received the nomination, I would probably be snowed under so deep by a Methodist boycott that it would take a Methodist hell millions of years to melt the ice away enough so that I could receive the benefit of its genial hospitality. Like the sailor who froze to death at the North Pole, I might reform at last, and pray to go to hell for a change of climate. The trouble with the world is, we hav not quite quit looking back. Hell, like the thumb-screw, and rack, and the Inquisition, and the stake (at which witches and new varieties of Christians were formerly burnt), are things of the past—of a dark age. It seems to me that religious, blind, ignorant, and insolent faith comes from that dark past. It is a trembling fear transmitted down to us from generation to generation, and as we hav long since lost our resemblance to the ape by losing his caudal appendage, so, too, we are gradually losing this superstition, this fear, this "total depravity," which holds us back from the true mission of our lives. What are we here for, to tremble and fear or to learn and progress? is being asked more and more frequently. Infidelity, in religious circles, now means the same thing as heresy, which is thoughtfulness—a careful questioning of Bible writings—and is so recognized and feared by the church. The greatest divines whose minds hav ever overgrown the narrow confines of their creeds, and dogmas, and articles of faith, are proud of being called heretics and Infidels. It shows the world that they are among its thinking people. When the hardshell Baptist pokes his head out from under his hard shell and asks a question, it shows that "the world do move." Heresy and Infidelity are becoming popular, and the church must soon go to the wall or discard a large majority of the Bible absurdities. The Bible must be rearranged and rewritten so as to be consistent in its parts or its usefulness to priests must soon come to an end.

The religions, like the people of the world, must look forward to better things, instead of holding on to old threadbare impossibilities. If we look back we must weep for the darkness which has overshadowed those we would hav loved had we known them, but if we look forward we can rejoice to think what our descendants may be. A few days ago a friend of mine, who publishes a magazine, asked me to giv him what insight I could into the past history of my ancestors. He meant this in the kindest spirit, and knowing that he did I could not feel insulted, but I declined. I did it in as gentle a way as I could, without making him feel as if I thought myself above him in the scale of evolution, but I said I considered their history too sacred to be monkeyed with—that there were some tales connected with the past history of the family which had better be kept concealed. I told him I thought Mr. Darwin had not used me quite right in some remarks which he had made about them in his book, that it made me feel sad, and I hoped that he would not let it occur again.

But when my friend wrote to me a second time, denouncing me in terms not complimentary, I felt called on to explain in full, so I said: No, sir, I cannot tell you much about my ancestry, but if my old grandfather was here he could tell you all about it. He would draw the family genealogy on you, and you would do well to get any dinner today. I never take much interest in the matter myself, because I believe if I should go back far enough I might find that some of my old grandparents had tails and were covered with hair; perhaps had hair on their teeth. For instance, I hav from good authority that one of my ancestors had an ancestor whose name was McClun, and came from the north end of one of the British Isles (which isle is indicated by the prefix), where he formerly resided with other McCluns in a region of caves. Now, I am not at all anxious to locate any particular cave where any of my folks hav groveled around or eaten dirt in ignorance, although, mind you, I am not ashamed of them. I know that I am having all the enjoyment out of life that I can possibly get and learning all that my limited capacity will admit of; therefore I do not care to wade back into the musty past to suffer over again, in my mind, what my ancestors (peace to their ashes) hav suffered in the flesh that I might liv. They were, no doubt, progressiv Infidels, else I should be rearing my boys in the same old cave. As they were then progressiv, thus making it possible for me to liv in a better dwelling, I, in turn, who cannot repay them, owe my future progeny all the time I can possibly spare (after providing a place to liv and something to eat) in progressing, so as to make it possible for them to still better enjoy their time in the world than I do. We do not say, in a spirit of egotism, that we are better than our Scotch, Irish, English, Dutch, or French ancestors, but we do say that if we do not try to be better and smarter we hav not done our duty in life.

I am not going to run my pedigree back far enough to take any chances of finding Moses, or any of those old murderers of innocent babies, at the other end of it; neither would it help any of us to know to what heartrending and hairbreadth escapes of our grandfathers and grandmothers we owe our existence. We are here; then why not make the best of it, and advance by our own efforts? We hav no time to look back, except where it will help us to avoid error by using our reason, because our duty is to those who come after us and not to those who hav gone before. My mother's religion is good enough for me provided it is true and cannot be improved on. However, if I can improve on it and make it better by applying the latest discoveries, by leaving out some of the hell, and helping people to heaven, with a more desirable class than hav been formerly admitted there, it is my duty to my children (not to her) to do so. My father's farming is good enough for me, provided some one does not invent machinery with which I can do better farming easier. So is the McClun cave a good enough dwelling-place for me—provided I cannot better my condition. I think, instead of taking up the whole of my time looking back over past generations for a history, I will just turn my face in the other direction and fill my brains (limited) with rosy pictures of the future, and better brains of my boys and girls, and my grandboys and grandgirls, and giv them a chance to investigate by science and reason, so that they may enjoy themselvs without fear or superstition, and call me blessed. Happiness is the greatest blessing which we can hav, and we are too apt to undervalue it. If we make those around us happy we are the center of the happiness we create; on the other hand, if we make those around us unhappy, we are in the middle of a little "hell on earth" which increases in warmth as fuel is added. Let us teach our children to unravel these social problems and cultivate charity instead of selfishness; and let us hope they will throw over our lives the mantle of charity, and not be too inquisitiv about our personal habits. Let them imagin that we were better than we are if they want to; it will do them no harm and be as well for us perhaps.

Let the dear little Infidels employ their energy in learning something which will be of use to them and to those who come after them; they cannot change what has gone before, but every thought, every breath, influences what is to come after, on and on through all future ages.

There are some sacred things noted in the great "Book of Books" which are so confoundedly sacred that they should hav been left out; but the inspired historian was wise, very wise, to trace the genealogy of Jesus back through the ancestors of poor old Joseph, thus drawing the attention away from the Ghost and Mary, and we often find ourselvs wickedly wondering whether certain people who hav such great renown of ancestry would not be more certain of their origin were they to trace their mother's instead of their father's genealogy.

Real prayer is an earnest desire for a reasonable object to be attained. Then giv us the home where the religion taught is honesty and charity, and the prayer offered is that earnest desire for good and happiness which inspires personal action instead of blind, faithful stupidity.

My friends, in that spirit of progress, let us pray.

An Opportunist.

The Opportunist indorses the good in every reform, and of two evils he chooses the lesser. He labors to promote the interests of every system that is better than the present one, and casts his greatest influence where it will be the most effectiv, where it will do the most good; namely, with the reform that the opportunities of the times render the most likely to succeed. He welcomes whatever reform comes first, and works for future good in the same way by cooperating with all of those who advocate causes that would improve humanity; directing his greatest efforts in lines most in harmony with the progressiv opportunities of the times. I am an Opportunist; the laboring masses are not Opportunists, and this is just what is the matter with them. Their characters, like those of their ancestors, are the result of the environments of themselvs and their ancestors ad infinitum; and oppression for ages has denied these so many advantages which improve humanity that it is not strange at the present time that they often mistake insolence for ability, epithets for theorems, and abuse for logical argument; that each reform tries to raise itself by the competitiv plan of pulling down the others, and they waste upon each other the ammunition they should reserve for their common enemy. We may "ring" the hogs that need not root for a living, and cut the claws of those tigers whose wants are provided for, but were this practice continued for many generations, the young of these species would still be born with prime snouts or claws and a disposition to use them. The workingmen must learn the very first lesson in coöperation is to coöperate with each other. Unless they do this they cannot achieve more than local success, until some one of the several reforms now advocated has become strong enough, first, to vanquish its rivals, and secondly, to vanquish its rivals and the common enemy combined. I claim that, assuming any of these systems is perfect, it can be established more quickly by the Opportunist's method I hav described, than by any other one, and each step in this method produces benefits that may be enjoyed until a better system is established. Every system of economics yet devised is objectionable in some respects, and I should be wiser than those that hav preceded me could I suggest a perfect one; but each of these is more perfect than the present one; so I work for all of them, and although I hav a leaning toward Socialism, and am to this extent opposed to Anarchy, which is just the opposit, I will work for the latter in preference to Socialism when it stands a better chance of succeeding; and so say I of Communism, equal rights, and Prohibition, and even Democracy, when I can "pair off" with a Republican and both vote for the cause that we mutually favor. The new election law spoils this plan for me, but is not in force everywhere, and when one can see how his comrade votes this rule is a good one.

I favor anything that is better than the present; let us review the situation and start.

Carlyle divides society abstractly into three classes of workers—beggars and thieves, and this distinction is maintained by the law in every sense except the right one. It does not always call things by their right names.

All persons must consume and use the necessaries of life, and he who is able to create the value he consumes and does not do so, imposes a burden on some one that ought not to bear it. Value can only be created by labor; it should enrich its creator, and the unconsumed productions of each generation revert to the succeeding one, which enjoys thereby a higher environment than it could create. It is obvious that the happiness of one individual is as much a consideration as that of another, but the law wills this otherwise. It decrees that it is a crime to be without the means of subsistence or to beg or steal it, or to violate the restrictions it imposes on labor, which make it impossible for many to obtain employment. Men do not prefer to starve, nor will they suffer privation and premature decay if they can help themselvs. Each should be allowed: first, to labor, and secondly, to retain the value created by his own industry. Many starve because they are not allowed to labor, and a proper verdict of death in many cases would be, "Killed by the law for being poor." What can the poor man do anyway? He cannot use the land, for this is owned; he cannot utilize its productions, for he has not money to buy them; he cannot liv on air and water, for this is a physiological impossibility. He may make the best terms he can with some one who has land, money, or credit, and failing in this, he may starve. He must not commit suicide, for the death of the unemployed would raise the price of labor. The law is made in the interest of the monopolist, and the incidental benefits it confers on the poor are the crumbs that fall from the rich man's table. The importation of emigrants is restricted, because there are already enough unemployed men in this country to keep wages at the lowest living price, and more would be an unnecessary burden on the taxpayers. Ditto of the laws against contracting for foreign laborers. The more money a government receives the less it needs, and the rich violator of the law to whom a fine may be of no consideration can pay it, and practically receive a rebate on his taxes, but the erring poor who own no property and work out their tax are incarcerated for a season, that they may reflect on the impropriety of their ways, and recall the adage that "In America it is no disgrace to be poor, but it is d——d inconvenient." The protectiv laws belong to the same category.

They protect the employer at the expense of his workmen, for whom they raise the price of the necessaries of life. Even the advantages of the law are not free to the poor, except in special cases, and then the party that has the most money usually fares best. Compare the evidence against Edward Stokes and the so-called evidence in the more recent case of Ben Ali and draw your own conclusions. Women necessarily compete with men for labor and children compete with both. Women and children can obtain employment when men cannot. Boys take men's places at boys' prices to be succeeded by men at boys' wages. Some starve because they cannot find work; others work in penal institutions at their own request and are robbed by the government. There is something wrong when men go hungry and farming does not pay, and when the laborer is poorly clad because he cannot afford to pay the tariff price, or its equivalent, on better goods. This is the situation. What are you going to do about it? We think that the Anarchists, Socialists, Nationalists, Communists, and Prohibitionists, the Single Tax party, and the Farmers' Alliance might unite their strength and discard their differences on the following platform:

1. That natural opportunities should be free to all; the land be purchased by the government by a special tax levied on actual values, and made free to all who will utilize it.

2. That each individual shall decide for himself those acts that primarily affect himself and secondarily affect society, and that the latter shall decide by majority rule those questions that primarily affect its interests and secondarily those of the individual.

A line can be drawn more easily at this point than elsewhere.

Mr. Swartz Says He Injured No One.

With the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, I had thought that my former communication would be the end of this controversy; but as he has seen fit to again refer to it, it is certainly not improper for me to again defend myself.

As in his former criticism, Mr. Macdonald uses a communication from a person whose name is not given, which is prima facie evidence of cowardice on the part of the writer of said letters. That part of the epistle of "Senator, Rockport, Mo.," relating to the fact of the passage by the Missouri legislature of a bill directed largely against the Kansas City Sunday Sun, is true. But that the Sun waited till the adjournment of the legislature before it published articles exposing alleged immoral acts of members of that body, is false. But, granting that it did, are the publishers of the paper any the less amenable to the law because the legislature has adjourned? Is the law void because, forsooth, the body that enacted it is no longer in session? A beautiful hypothesis! The charge that the Sun is "wholly irresponsible" is also untrue, as has been proven by actions brought in the courts; yet in Missouri the law is practically a dead letter, and is not "being enforced against it all over the state." The statement that "whoever sells it does so under cover of secresy" is a detestable and malicious falsehood, as it is sold openly and cried publicly on the streets, both in Kansas and Missouri, and wherever else it is in demand. As to the class of people who read it, I know (while I cannot say that I especially admire their taste) that it is read by some of the best people in this city. I would admonish the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER to ascertain the source of his information and the veracity and probity of his informants before he bases his arguments upon their unsupported assertions.

I still assert that none of the three issues of the Sun that I circulated contained a libel, and that I hav wronged no one. And how, may I ask, can I commit a crime or nuisance against the public without injuring an individual? Of what is this immaculate "public" composed? Are not individuals its component parts? Of course. How can I injure a bundle of sticks without injuring a stick?

I am sure Mr. Macdonald is well enough acquainted with legal enactments to know that a law intending "to protect the libeled from the libeler" would hav to be worded differently from one intended to suppress publications of a merely "sensational" character.

The Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER says: "We learn that the paper only prints names in full when it attacks the weak and defenseless." Are Speaker Elder of the late Kansas house of representativs, the metropolitan police commissioners and many members of the police force of this city, "weak and defenseless?" The names in full of these persons, together with incontrovertible evidence of their wrong-doing, hav been published in the Sun. And if Mr. Macdonald has "learned" what he says he has, he certainly cannot giv credence to "Senator's" statement that the Sun published articles against the members of the Missouri legislature, "giving their names;" for legislators are not generally considered "weak and defenseless."

I shall not ask space here to show that there is no necessity for the state to "protect people" from newspapers or any thing or person else; but I do maintain that in my case, as in the cases of Bennett, Heywood and Harman, the question of personal injury does not enter, and that this prosecution is a direct and forcible blow at the freedom of the press, for I hav invaded the liberty of no one.

Local Secular Unions.

A local Secular Union has been formed at Guthrie, Oklahoma Territory, and questions of administration and teaching hav been brought up which the members are unable to decide and which hav been referred to us for an opinion. They might, perhaps, with more propriety hav been referred to the American Secular Union headquarters, but as some of them are questions of general interest, and as it may be desirable that they be discussed at the congress of the Secular Union this fall we deem it well to giv them more publicity than even the question desired. We are asked:

"Is there such a thing as a Secular Sunday-school for children?"

We regret to say that there is none at present. There are some schools conducted by ethical societies, and some German societies hav schools approximating to what our correspondent evidently has in mind; but there are no real Secular Sunday-schools in which is taught the Secular philosophy. This is a lamentable state of affairs and ought to be remedied. The American Secular Union is of course primarily a political organization, as its objects must all be accomplished by voting and through political bodies. Nevertheless, it might well take up this branch of work, as the coming voters must be educated so that they will vote right. The churches train their children, thereby maintaining their political ascendency, and Liberals should do the same. And it is only fair to add that the present secretary of the American Secular Union lays much emphasis upon this matter, as may be seen in her paper printed in these columns a few weeks since.

"Do Secular Unionists antagonize the Bible, and is it not proper for individual members to discuss its divine origin in debate?"

To the first of these questions we can answer both ways—they do and they do not. So long as Christians do not seek to thrust the Bible upon the people by law, Secular philosophy would demand that it be not specially antagonized, that is, more than any other work of superstition—like the Koran, the Mormon Bible, etc. The basic principle of Secularism as a philosophy is that the present life being the only one of which we hav any knowledge, its concerns claim our earnest attention. This does not necessarily antagonize any spiritual, or other-world, teaching, but simply ignores it. However, as a matter of fact, Secular Unionists do antagonize the Bible, and for these reasons: The Secular Union was organized for political purposes, such as to get the Bible out of the schools, the oath out of our courts, the chaplains out of the army and navy, out of Congress and our state legislatures and institutions, "Sabbath" and religious days off the statute books, and "religious" morality—that is, artificial morality, founded upon the say-so of some alleged divine book or person—out of our laws. As all these iniquities are based upon the Bible, that is, the Bible is the authority of those who hav perpetrated them upon us, Secular Unionists must antagonize the authority as well as the persons who uphold it. For instance, Secular Unionists desire to abolish Bible reading in the schools. Certainly they must giv their reasons for desiring to do this. Now some of these reasons are, as stated by the distinguished president of the American Secular Union in his speech at the last congress of the Union, as follows:

Because there is no agreement as to what constitutes the Bible.

Because there is no common agreement as to what parts are historical and what parts are allegorical.

Because there is no common agreement as to what doctrins are taught in the Bible.

Because it contains so much that is cruel and obscene.

Because the moral is so mixed up with the immoral that there is great danger of contamination by contact.

Because of its defectiv morality.

Because it can be so manipulated by teachers as to favor their own peculiar views in religion.

Because such reading would not secure the object contemplated.

Because the Secular principle of the United States Constitution, and of the constitutions of the several states, render it unlawful.

This is certainly antagonizing the Bible, and doing it vigorously and well, and the first part of the second question must therefore be answered in the affirmativ.

And to the second part of the same query, "Is it proper for individual members to discuss the [alleged] divine origin of the Bible?" the answer is the same. The Bible, as we said, is the authority of those Christians who impose upon us through statutes. It is their authority because, as they allege, it is divine. Therefore, its alleged divinity is as proper a subject of discussion as its obscenity, cruelty, defectiv morality, unhistorical character, or doctrins. It is particularly the work of Secular Unionists to show that it is not divine, and therefore is of no authority—reasoning from the Christian standpoint. From the standpoint of the Secular philosophy "divinity" is something of which we know nothing, and so the Bible can be of no authority for this world because of this quality imputed to it.

"Is not debate the principal source from which flows the truth?"

Again we answer Yes. It is debate, or rather discussion, which has clarified the world's ideas, and settled most of the problems presented. By the presentation of all sides of a subject, truth is finally arrived at. But debaters should bear one thing in mind, and that is that facts are essential things. Disorderly talk does not help the truth. Debaters should lay in an ample supply of facts before promulgating their theories. This is where the Christians are particularly weak. They havn't a solid fact in their whole system. They do not even know—they cannot show except by the Bible, and no one can prove the Bible itself—that Jesus Christ ever existed. There may be probabilities, but there is no knowledge on the subject. And if some fanatical religious teacher did liv no one can show that he was of divine origin, for no one knows anything of divinity itself. Secularists, therefore, possess an immense advantage over their Christian opponents, because their philosophy demands that they deal with facts—the real things of life.

"Is it necessary to apply for a charter when we are only a temporary organization? Can a charter be granted before we become a permanent Union? and of what benefit is a charter?"

These are questions of detail and unimportant. A Liberal society can obtain a charter at any time, it being only necessary that the society is in sympathy with the objects of the Union, as set forth in the Nine Demands, which are as follows:

"1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall be no longer exempt from just taxation.

"2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in state legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.

"3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.

"4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.

"5. We demand that the appointment, by the president of the United States or by the governors of the various states, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.

"6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.

"7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.

"8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of 'Christian' morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.

"9. We demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several states, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly and promptly made."

The benefits of a charter are that it brings the society into correspondence with the national organization, enables it to send delegates to the annual congresses and hav a voice in shaping its policy. The constitution of the American Secular Union provides on this subject:

"The board of directors shall hav authority, as often as they receive a written application signed by twenty or more persons and accompanied by ten dollars (or ten or more persons accompanied by five dollars), to issue a charter for the formation of a local auxiliary Secular Union. Charters so issued shall contain constitutions substantially similar to this constitution but adapted to local wants. Local auxiliary Unions organized under charters issued by the board of directors shall be absolutely independent in the administration of their own local affairs. The effect of their charters shall be simply to unite them in cordial fellowship and efficient coöperation of the freest kind with the national Secular Union and with other local Unions. Every local auxiliary Secular Union organized in accordance with the provisions of this constitution shall be entitled to send its president and secretary and three other members as delegates to the annual congress, who shall hav the right to speak and vote."

The foregoing answers two queries in the fourth questions. The last, "Of what benefit is a charter?" will be answered by various societies differently. If the society is merely a local debating society, or ethical school, with no intentions of helping in the work of the national organization, and with no desire to become affiliated and in correspondence with it or other local Unions, then a charter is of no special benefit. But local Unions, which place the work of the national Union before their own debates, can derive important advantages from close affiliation with the national Union, and can also help it substantially. As to the work of the Union, we believe its methods ought to be changed. What we said upon the subject last winter—and which met with emphatic approval from all over the country—we still hold to be good policy for the national Union, and as the time for the next Congress is rapidly approaching, it may be well, while upon the subject, to reprint it for the consideration of the delegates and members and supporters of the Union. We there said: "The work of the Union, it seems to us, should be not so much in organizing societies as in maintaining a headquarters from which to watch the progress of events, to prevent religious legislation, and to secularize existing laws. Auxiliary societies do not support the Union; indeed, they rarely put themselvs forward as organized opposition to unfavorable legislation. Local business influences prevent. Individuals support the Union, and individuals hav done all that has been done to enforce the Nine Demands. The Union president and secretary should watch Congress and go before its committees when occasion requires. They should keep their eyes upon state legislatures and prevent the enactment of religious laws; at least make a protest, if they can do no more. They should be prepared when men are prosecuted for breaking Sunday laws or for committing "blasphemy," to defend them, concentrating the whole influence of the Liberals of the country upon one point if necessary. They should, when the way is opened, go into new places and set forth the objects of the Secular Union. They should prepare comprehensiv pamphlets and brief tracts upon each one of the Nine Demands, and see that this literature is distributed where it will do good. The support of the Union always has come from the Infidels of the country, and it must of necessity, financial if no other, be what the world will call an Infidel organization. And so be it. Instead of detesting the word Infidel the Union should be proud of it, and call the attention of Christians to the fact that Infidels are the only ones who will work for justice and to maintain American principles. Let the Union say to the churches, "You hav made our work; you seek to perpetuate and add to your infamous tyranny, and if we are Infidels because we oppose you, then Infidels we are and will be."

"Is it proper to sing hymns in the Union or to form Bible classes?"

Why not? Music is a great civilizer. It ought to be given much and often. The churches used to frown upon it, but finally adopted it, adapting their hymns to the best tunes. "Old Hundred" was originally a German drinking-song; and it is as good now as then. There is nothing sacred in a musical note. But of course a Secular Union should not use church hymns. We hav several Liberal hymn-books—the Truth Seeker Collection, Mrs. Burnz's Hymn Book, and, best of all, the Cosmian Hymn Book, edited by L. K. Washburn. The Truth Seeker Collection also has recitations for the use of Liberal young people. The Cosmian Hymn Book songs are set to music, the others adapted to popular and well-known tunes.

And we should like to see a Bible class in every local Secular Union. The study of the Bible destroys its hold upon the people. For such classes we recommend Keeler's Short History of the Bible, The Bible for Learners, Bible Myths and their Parallels in Other Religions, Self-Contradictions of the Bible, and the Bible itself. Another class in historical Christianity, using the English Freethinker's Text-Book, Taylor's Diegesis, Supernatural Religion, Greg's Creed of Christendom, Gibbon's History of Christianity, Buckle's History of Civilization, Lecky's Rationalism in Europe, and a few others, would complete the education of the members of the Union in that direction and leave them in no doubt as to how to regard the claims of the church.

"Is there any regalia worn by any officers of the Union?"

We are glad to be able to answer this in the negativ. Wearing regalia is childish. But if Freethinkers desire to be able to recognize each other by some outward symbol, Otto Wettstein has a badge-pin of considerable beauty, and Miss Lucy Churchill another, though we do not know where this last can now be obtained, as the patentee is dead. Freethinkers in European countries hav generally adopted the Pansy—from the French word pensée, meaning thought—but in this country this emblem would be practically useless, as it is worn by a great many as a mere adornment. If Mr. Wettstein would reduce the size of his badge-pin about two-thirds it would overcome the objections of many who now refuse to wear any distinguishing marks. But we hope no Secular Unionist will ever put on regalia. It is a relic of barbarism which ought to go as civilization advances.

Priests and Journalism in Snohomish, Wash.

A leering, greasy-faced, and repulsiv priest named F. X. Guay, at Snohomish, Washington, was recently accused of the most bestial conduct of which it is possible to conceive, and a mob of about sixty went down to his house the other night, roused him out, and covered him with a coat of tar and feathers. He would hav been thrown into the river the next night if he had not used the daylight between to leave town. It was not the first time the priest had been adjudged guilty, as he was removed from a parish in North Dakota for gross immorality, and the verdict on his last punishment is that it served him right.

The incident is made more interesting to readers of this journal because George E. Macdonald, when he retired from Freethought, made his way to Snohomish and entered into publishing relations with C. H. Packard of the Eye. Naturally the Eye came down upon the priest, while its loathsome contemporary, to curry favor with the Catholics, suppressed the story about the tar and feathers. Naturally, again, the Eye said something about the aforesaid contemporary. And here's where the interest comes in. The editor of the loathsome contemporary proposes to shoot the senior editor of the Eye, Mr. Packard, on sight, and we tremble lest he carry his wrath to the junior editor, for we find in the Eye an account of the loathsome contemporary's visit to the Eye sanctum, which we will wager something came from the pen of the Man with the Badge Pin. This is how it happened:

"A fierce looking individual, loaded with several inches of adulterated hydrant water and a big revolver, which he said he had borrowed especially for the present crisis, awaited the senior Eye man's return from breakfast last Saturday morning. The distinguishing features of the combination were those of Frank Mussetter, editor and reputed owner of our at times luminous contemporary. Mussetter was evidently 'riled.' He reads the Eye and thus keeps thoroughly posted on local and domestic affairs, although the scarcity of news and original editorials in his own paper might lead his subscriber to doubt it. As we said before, Mussetter was riled. It might hav been the Eye 'scoop' in exposing the priest and the Sun's supposed connection with the affair, but he didn't say so directly. Placing his good right hand on his pistol pocket, he inquired, in a fierce, double-leaded voice, fortified with beer, if the Eye man had a gun. Being informed that the chief engineer of this great journalistic molder of public opinion (for our subscription rates see card at head of editorial column) was not in the habit of having such dangerous things in his possession when inside the city limits (vide Ordinance No. 4), Mussetter cautioned us to procure a weapon. He said he had come to shoot us; that he had borrowed a gun from Charlie C—— h—— s with that object in view, and he proposed to use it. He was informed that he would probably never find a better time and opportunity than now presented themselvs; also that he was making a damfool of himself. The Eye man explained that he was not a shootist, but would try to accommodate him with all the satisfaction he might desire in any other way. Mussetter averred that both he and his paper had been greatly hurt (we don't doubt it) by the Eye's articles, the truthfulness of which he did not deny; and that he could be satisfied with nothing short of shooting us. However, he graciously concluded to postpone the killing, and gracefully withdrew, remarking, in a four-to-pica tone of voice, that he would surely open fire the next time he met us, and that we had better be prepared to meet our God, or words to that effect."

This is pretty bad for so warlike an individual as the editor of the loathsome contemporary, and we expect to hear next that he is after the junior editor, but as that individual never saw a pistol and as it is contrary to the Western code of civilization to pull on a man who is not heeled he may escape. Pending further warlike demonstrations on the part of the loathsome contemporary the editor of the Eye has proposed this way out of the difficulty. (Notice the boom for the electric motor line.)

"We propose, then, to giv him satisfaction in just as big wads as he desires. According to the code, being the challenged party, we hav the choice of time, place, weapons, and rules to govern the meeting. As to time, we prefer the witching hour of midnight, when the moon and the boys are usually full; when all nature and policemen are supposed to sleep, and there is no danger of being run into the city's refrigerator for disturbing the peace. Place: Banks of the classic Stillaguamish, near the terminus of the electric motor line. Weapons: Either 45-caliber fishballs or two-column double-leaded tariff editorials at one thousand paces. Rules: Firing not to cease until one or both combatants are killed or mortally wounded. No one to be present except principals and seconds—physicians, priests, or other medical or spiritual advisers especially excluded. If either shoots his mouth off before the proper signal is given, it shall be the privilege of the other, before the fight proceeds, to draw on him for drinks for irrigating readers of both papers for a period of three months immediately following."

Conducting a Freethought journal in San Francisco may be wearing on body and mind, but editing an every-other-daily paper up in the wild and woolly Northwest seems to be fully as dangerous to life and limb.

The King Case to Be Appealed.

We are glad to learn from their organ that the Seventh Day Adventists are going to appeal from the decision of Judge Hammond to the Supreme Court of the United States in the King case. They believe that it was the intention of those who framed the Constitution of the United States, and its several amendments, to entirely separate the state from the church, and to guarantee to all our citizens the fullest religious as well as civil freedom, and propose to find out whether or not they are in error.

If Judge Hammond's decision shall stand, the Saturday keepers, whether Jew or gentile, will hav a cross to bear. The Review and Herald sees the situation and the danger, for it says:

"We hav always looked upon our National Constitution as an insurmountable barrier against any invasion of our religious rights. It has been the continued boast of our nation that all religions with their varying and contradictory beliefs, stood on an equality, and were alike protected from the persecutions prompted by the bigotry or intolerance of any one. But it seems from the interpretations of the Constitution given by Judge Hammond in this case, that there is nothing whatever in that instrument to secure our rights to peaceably labor on Sunday, even after we hav strictly observed the seventh day of the week. We cannot believe that the aims of our Constitution may be thus set aside, and hence desire to hav the matter tested in the court of last resort.

"When a state has a clause in its Sunday law, as is the case in Illinois, exempting those who observe another day, and then in the face of that a court can be found that thinks it can find reason for fining a man contrary to that law, it plainly points to the rising sentiment favoring an arbitrary establishing and enforcing of Sunday laws.

"The important duty of the hour is to get the principles of present truth brought clearly before the people. As these questions are being agitated, we want to hav our work so fully before the public that correct positions may be taken by those who care to investigate. This case of Brother King is attracting the attention of the nation. Newspapers are discussing it, and the public generally are giving it serious thought. It has already been decided to carry the case up to the United States Supreme Court. We do this to make the last and only possible effort to secure justice. But at the same time it will afford a great opportunity to spread the principles underlying our work, while the public mind is fixed on this case."

The reference to the Sunday laws of Illinois is to as flagrant a case of petty injustice as ever one Christian perpetrated upon another. A Seventh Day Adventist, one David Longnecker, was arrested on a charge stated as follows:

"Jacob Tidmore complains that David Longnecker, of the county of Macon and State of Illinois, on the first day of the week commonly called Sunday, to wit, on the 19th day of July, A.D. 1891, was guilty of making a great noise, screaming, and talking with a loud voice, whereby the peace of the affiant and his family was then and there disturbed."

The arrest was based on Sec. 262 of the statutes of Illinois, which provides for a fine of not more than twenty-five dollars for disturbing the peace of any private family, "by any noise, rout, or amusement, on the first day of the week, called Sunday." The complainant failed to prove the charge, he himself admitting that Mr. Longnecker was heard to speak to his horses, to start and stop them, and not louder than was necessary, nor louder than he would on any other day.

Illinois has another Sunday law (Sec. 261) which forbids common labor on Sunday, but exempts "whomsoever thinks proper to keep any other day as a Sabbath." Failing to convict under Sec. 262, Mr. Longnecker was found "guilty in that he had labored on the Sabbath," and ordered to pay a fine and costs amounting to $17.80. The decision was based on Sec. 261, not referred to in the indictment, and which contains an exemption clause as quoted.

Mr. Tidmore had a visitor at the time he was disturbed, who was also disturbed by Mr. Longnecker's working, and as Mr. Longnecker came past, called to him with a blasphemous oath, and asked if he was a heathen. One of the witnesses for the plaintiff declared that he should not be disturbed by swearing, for he swore himself, but he would be disturbed by anyone doing near his house as Mr. Longnecker had done near Mr. Tidmore's house. Mr. Longnecker has appealed his case, and will resist his Christian persecutors as long as the courts will allow.

The Adventists are particularly anxious about these Sunday laws, and they are the very best fighters against them, for they affect the bread and butter and dollar and cents question. And the Liberals of the country can but wish them success.

Editorial Notes.

At the last meeting of the Executiv of the National Secular Society of England Mr. Samson proposed that the Freethought organizations in the English colonies and the United States of America be approached with a view to exchange reports of progress made and work done in the movement. Mr. Hartmann seconded the proposal, and it was adopted. Mr. Samson proposed and Mr. Brumage seconded, "That Colonel Ingersoll be invited on a lecturing tour to England," which motion was also carried.

In the Youth's Evangelist, in "Talks About the Commandments," is this bare-faced falsehood: "Q. Which day of the seven hath God appointed to be the weekly Sabbath? A. From the beginning of the world to the resurrection of Christ, God appointed the seventh day of the week to be the weekly Sabbath; and the first day of the week, ever since, to continue to the end of the world, which is the Christian Sabbath." This is the way children are deceived by their religious teachers—deliberately lied to. There is not a theologian in the world who can show, even if there was a God and the Bible is his word, that the rest-day was ever changed by "divine" authority to the first day of the week.

Letters from Friends.

This Will Free Some One's Mind.

OSTERVILLE, MASS., July 19, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Please continue my subscription and send a copy of Bible Pictures when ready. The balance, $2, is to help in the expense of publishing the paper, to which I hav been a subscriber for ten years or more, and which I think a great deal of. C. W. CROSBY.

The Best Scripture Commentaries.

CONNERSVILLE, IND., Aug. 6, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $2 50, for which please send me the "Freethinkers' Pictorial Text-Book." Mr. Heston's pictures are the best commentators on the scriptures that I hav ever met with. I hope that he will preserve in book form all his works. Yours truly, S. N. HAMILTON.

Thanks, Mr. Beach, for Ourselvs and for Mankind.

TAMPA, FLA., June 30, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $5. Send THE TRUTH SEEKER one year. The balance use for the good of the business or for the pictures. I do not see how THE TRUTH SEEKER could be any better. It suits me. I hope every subscriber will do as much as this. I wish I was able to do ten times as much. H. W. BEACH.

Values the Work of Reference.

MONTREAL, CAN., July 27, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I am now fifty years of age, and hav read a great many papers, but THE TRUTH SEEKER, to my mind, is the best, and the pictures are wonderful. Of course, I am a member of the Freethought Club and hav all the reading I want, but your paper I will take as long as I am able, as a book for reference. With kind wishes for your continued prosperity, I remain, W. DEUCHARS.

A True Friend to Freethought.

ROYAL CENTER, IND., July 21, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I went to work to get three subscribers to THE TRUTH SEEKER. I am nearing the seventies, and must work while I can. I want THE TRUTH SEEKER to last always, and I would say a little politics is all right. And I rather like the Spiritualists; they take a fellow as he is and try to improve on him. If a person has brains and wants a hearing, all right; if nothing but a head, let him go. Miss Craddock's Peter's pence I will raise to $1. You can see she gets it.

Yours, GEO. HENDEE.

The Sinews of War.

ROANOKE, VA., Aug. 4, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I redeem the first part of my pledge by inclosing you $10. Of course it is very little toward the good cause; but if all Freethinkers will contribute a little, it will giv you courage and strength to battle for the right, truth, and liberty; to preserve that sacred heritage bequeathed to us by those noble martyrs to Freethought, that has cost so much of blood, sacrifice, and anguish, and which seems to be appreciated and prized by so few. Wishing you every success, I remain, Yours truly, JOSIAH FRIEND.

An Appeal for Truth on Labor.

STREATOR, July 18, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose my widow's mite for my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER. I am sixty-five years of age and digging coal as hard as ever I did in my life, and I think a labor question through your valuable paper would be a blessing to the mining community at large, for they are the white slaves of America. Long liv THE TRUTH SEEKER, and continue the pictures, and as long as I liv and can work I will take it. I remain,

Yours for liberty, ANDREW SWAIN.

Superstition Is the Direst Monster.

SALEM, O., July 19, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Infidels' roads are not the most pleasant among those who love ther enemies. Do not stop THE TRUTH SEEKER. It suits me as it is being run. I wou'd say that an occasional discussion of a few other prominent topics, such as labor, Farmers' Alliance, and hygiene, would certainly please me, and, I think, be of more or less benefit to the majority of your readers. But let the greatest efforts be directed against Superstition, for that, in my opinion, is the monster that is threatening our liberties.

As ever, for liberty, J. W. SLAYTON.

A Parson Cornered.

POTTER, ARK., August 3, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been waiting on some who promised to subscribe for THE TRUTH SEEKER. I want John Peck and others to know that they are not alone in the battle for Freethought. I hav been putting in some effectual blows. A minister hunted me up the other day to convert me; a crowd assembled to see the fun. The first question I asked him was, how Cain used the word nations when he said, "The nations of the earth will seek me to slay me." The Bible teaches that there were only three persons in the world at that time. Words are used to represent objects, and if nations were there the Bible is mistaken. The parson has not answered the question yet. I asked him how it happened, if the witnesses of Christ were inspired, that they contradicted each other. One said he was crucified three hours, one six hours, one nine hours. He said that was a mistranslation. I asked him what he thought about God trying to drown all the wicked and letting the devil in the ark? He said he was not in the ark, and I told him that he was not drowned, and he, too, had been the cause of all the trouble. As we hav all, my true friends, engaged for a higher life, let us liv it.

J. R. PERRY.

Deplores the Indifference of Liberals.

CLINTON, MO., July 22, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I read THE TRUTH SEEKER regularly; look for it each week very anxiously, and read it with a wonderful satisfaction and pleasure. In fact, I need it almost as much as the bread I eat. It furnishes me with food—not a mixture of flour and water, but thought, that food for the mind that will hav such an important part to play in the future in liberating millions of minds from the worst form of slavery. The principles of Freethought hav gradually grown in me from childhood, without any teachings, save from nature's great and instructiv book, until now, at the age of twenty-seven years, I am very fearless in expressing my religious views to the most orthodox Christian. There are many Liberals in this section, but most of them not sufficiently unfettered to honestly express their opinions regardless of consequences. But, like thousands of others all over these broad, beautiful United States, they lie dormant, permitting the golden days of their lives to slip by (when they could be doing much for the cause of humanity), and quietly wait for some leader in their cause to suddenly spring into existence and "lead the procession."

I am yours for truth and honesty, F. H. MORAST.

Thinks We Should be Shot.

FORT SMITH, ARK., July 24, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been a reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER for six months and I hav come to the conclusion that I can not do without it. This is the dull season of the year with us and money is very scarce. I hav tried to get subscribers, but failed to get anything but some very fair promises for the future. There are some persons here that like to read the paper that think they cannot spare the money at present. Then there are others that want to read it that are able to pay for it, but they are afraid to subscribe for the paper through fear of religious persecution or boycott in business by their religious neighbors. Last Sunday I heard a lady say that anyone that would read that paper should be taken out and shot, and that they should not be allowed Christian burial. Such is loving Christianity. I read my papers and then place them where they will do the most good, and I keep them on the move. My "Pictorial Text-Book" is all the time on the go. I think they will hav the desired effect after a while. We hav a good many Freethinkers here, but very few of them are willing to admit it openly. If we could hav a good lecture here I think there would be a good many come out and show their colors. You may consider me a committee of one to work for the interest of your paper and for the good of the cause. JAMES O'NEIL.

Wish to Cut Her Tongue Out.

LONE ROCK, ORE., July 20, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find $5, which you will please place to my account with the dear, brave old TRUTH SEEKER. It will pay arrearages and giv me one year more of intellectual feasts, a sensible kind of love-feasts; for that is what THE TRUTH SEEKER is in our family circle. We simply cannot get along without it. I sincerely pity the dear friends who want the paper and are not able to pay for it, but still more do I pity those who are not capable of appreciating a good thing when they see it.

We hav just had the pleasure of listening to five lectures, including the Fourth oration, by Mrs. Mattie P. Krekel. She is a fine speaker, so earnest and honest. I do not see how she could fail to take even the bloody shirt Christians by storm. I guess she made some of the said B. S. species quake in their boots from what I hear. The poor little narrow, contracted Methodist minister located at Prinesville remarked that the proper way to deal with her would be to cut her tongue out. He was scared by that little unruly member that Paul was scared by long, long ago. Oh, but I hope it will wag for the next fifty years to come, and by that time set lots more of them to jingling. I am well acquainted with this little Methodist who is so anxious for roast tongue. He used to lie and beg for the glory of God here in Lone Rock. He would pray and scream to his Josh to come down and take a solemn walk in the congregation and while promenading to lay the unbelievers on a long bed of sickness and meddle with their digestiv organs and shut off their appetite for food. I think his Josh was deaf or was off on some other jamboree. Probably he could not understand him. I know I could not tell whether he wanted us to lie on a long bed or lie on a short one a long time, and of course if he wanted us all laid on one bed he would want a long one.

You ask me how you could better THE TRUTH SEEKER; and honestly, I do not see how you could improve it unless you would make it as long again, and then probably you would get a chance to put a word edgewise yourself, and I should like that, and it would giv Brother Heston more rope, and giv more scope for the discussion of all sensible subjects, which I am sure ought to interest everybody—and it would thus prove the paper to be a genuin TRUTH SEEKER of the nineteenth century.

Please send me some back numbers to use in my missionary work, for mine are worn to rags. I will send for some tracts and good pamphlets to lend soon. I long to read the lives of Paine and Bradlaugh.

Yours for Freethought, MRS. A. M. CRAWFORD.

Scriptural Liars Equaled by Journalistic.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS., July 28, 1891.

TO THE BLASPHEMOUS EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER:

Dear Sir: The inclosed newspaper slip relativ to the imprisonment of a sailor in a whale's belly for thirty-six hours is a complete refutation of the denial made by you and others that such a thing never occurred in regard to Jonah. If you are an honest man you will now retract all that you hav said about the Bible and Mr. Talmage. I hope you will yet see the error of your way and come to Jesus. Of course, however, you will not dare to publish this account, for it would tend to weaken the wicked cause espoused by you. Your destination, unless you repent, is Hell—an everlasting Hell. Bear that in mind, for a day of reckoning must come.

For Christ's sake, GEO. S. BROWN.

A MODERN JONAH.

James Bartley, of New Bedford, Mass., who has just returned from a whaling expedition in the South Atlantic, has had a remarkable experience. He is a veritable Jonah, having existed for thirty-six hours in the belly of a whale.

Last February, while engaged with a number of other men of his vessel in harpooning two monstrous whales near the Falkland islands, the boat was capsized and the men thrown into the water. Before the crew could pick them up, one man had been drowned and Bartley had disappeared. The crew succeeded in killing one of the whales and in a few hours the great body was lying on the ship's side and the men were busy with axes and spades cutting through the flesh to secure the fat. They worked all day, resumed operations the next afternoon, and were soon down to the stomach. The workmen were startled while laboring to clear it and to fasten the chain about it to discover something doubled up in it that gave spasmodic signs of life. The vast pouch was cut open and inside was found the missing sailor doubled up and unconscious.

During his brief sojourn in the whale's belly, Bartley's skin, where it was exposed to the action of the gastric juices, underwent a striking change. His face and hands were bleached to a deathly whiteness, and the skin was wrinkled, giving the man the appearance of having been parboiled.

Bartley affirms that he would probably hav lived inside his house of flesh until he starved, for he lost his senses through fright and not through lack of air. He says that he remembers the sensation of falling into the water; then there was a fearful rushing sound, which he believed to be the beating of the water by the whale's tail; then he was encompassed by a fearful darkness, and he felt himself slipping along a smooth passage of some sort that seemed to move and carry him forward. This sensation lasted but an instant, then he felt that he had more room. He felt about him, and his hands came in contact with a yielding, slimy substance that seemed to shrink from his touch. It finally dawned upon him that he had been swallowed by the whale, and he was overcome with horror at the situation. He could breathe easily, but the heat was terrible. It was not of a scorching, stifling nature, but it seemed to open the pores of his skin and to draw out his vitality. He became very weak and grew sick at his stomach. He knew that there was no hope of escape from his strange prison. Death stared him in the face, and he tried to look at it bravely, but the awful quiet, the fearful knowledge of his environments, and the terrible heat finally overcame him, and he must hav fainted, for the next he remembered was being in the captain's cabin.—Syracuse Saturday Globe.

Rebuke to a Truckling Editor.

WORCESTER, MASS, July 22, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: The following correspondence is self-explanatory, and, I think, of sufficient public importance to justify me in offering it to the press, as it is a simple exhibition of the methods and attitude of "Christian" reformers, the Times being the Prohibition organ of Massachusetts, and the last clause of its assistant editor's letter showing that its sneeze at my colors came from the bugle of its chief.

The same rule that refuses to giv a customer notice of a book would burn it and its author also if consistently carried out. The prohibition of a universally acknowledged evil traffic is one thing, the suppression of loyal and "sublime" literature is quite another. J. P. G.

WORCESTER, MASS., July 22, 1891.

MR. JOHN PRESCOTT GUILD, Dear Sir: I return to you the copy of the "Flag we Float," which I find upon perusal to contain some very sublime passages and some very strong points; but it assumes to be too iconoclastic to permit of a notice in the Times, which I had promised you. I regret that I made the promis without a knowledge of the contents of the book. The Times has convictions as well as yourself, and it cannot giv its sanction to the distribution of what it considers calculated to work great harm, especially to those who are beginning to think out for themselvs the problems of God, religion, and life. Not that true religion has anything to fear from a free discussion of all points at issue between the skeptic and the believer, but the civilized world has been so long slave to creed that Liberalism must be handled very carefully lest it cause such a reaction to itself as will substitute the creed evil with a greater one—that of no creed at all. By and by the pendulum will come to a rest at the golden mean of truth.

Understand, please, that in these latter observations I speak only for myself.

O. M. DONALDSON, Assistant Editor Times.

VERMONT HOUSE, WORCESTER, MASS., July 25, 1891.

O. M. DONALDSON, Assistant Editor Times, Dear Sir: In returning my "Flag," with withdrawal of promis to notice, you assume too much of the spirit of the Spanish Inquisition to be regarded as a good representativ of American principle. You hav, by acknowledging my little book to contain "sublime passages" and "strong points," proven yourself not to be so big a booby as you might hav been, but by refusing it the courtesy of a newspaper notice because you do not agree with all its conclusions and inferences you misjudge your own office, that of presenting to the public what is current, either with or without your "sanction" or censure. Every editor that is fit to finger a quill has "convictions" of his own, and one of them should be to giv a fair show to other people's honest thoughts, especially when they are "strong" and "sublime," defiant of wrong and triumphant in truth. Your backward course must hav been decided upon without much "consideration." Certainly the half hour you may hav taken to glance over my address much less fitted you to judge of its import and popular effect than the half-score years of study by its author devoted to its preparation.

I am acquainted with literature of every class, from the fish story of Jonah to Jack and the Beanstalk, from the laws of Confucius to the last Congressional Record, and I do not know of anything more suitable to put in the hands of those "beginning to think" than my exposition of "American principle," which aims to emancipate the mind from thralldom of fraudulent authority. Its topic is not "religion" but politics, and if you do not know that the American government was built without regard to the ghosts or the Gods, your school-books hav been too defectiv and your teachers too derelict. I do not know why the believer in what nobody can find out and what contravenes all common sense should affect to ignore and despise the skeptic who has every reason to doubt, or why he should insult the philosopher who presents scientific demonstration and cogent reasoning to substantiate his propositions, which are made for the dignification of manhood. The gospel of Liberalism should be distributed broadcast, for it can work nothing but good and will make many begin to think who never had a thought before in all their priest-ridden lives. There is nothing against the cause of theological creed so great as the fact which you fear of reaction and relapse to moral obliquity on the credulist's learning that he has been duped. Therefore, in plying the iconoclastic hammer of logic against the "creed evil" I am always careful to put in place of the false idol the living form of truth pedestaled on the immovable rock of eternal principle which needs not the rod of Aaron to prop it, the miter of Peter to cap it, nor the type of the times to "sanction" it. The "pendulum" of prejudice may swing as it will and "rest" where it can, the truth abides the same and it is the worse for those who do not find it. You say you speak for yourself alone, and your youthfulness and inexperience shall be your excuse. While infants mount editors' chairs the press will squeeze out drivel. "When babes sit in the lap of philosophy there will be hope for the world."

"Should We Hav a Day of Rest?" Refuted.

BLOOMDALE, O., July 27, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I see in THE TRUTH SEEKER of July 25th an article entitled, "Should We Hav a Day of Rest?" by one Mr. H. Stites. He starts out saying that it is not a very pleasant position for one to be in when he is forced to disagree with the great majority of those with whom he is associated in the great reform movement of the day, and says that is his lot on the Sunday question. Well, I would just say that I feel sorry for anyone if he gets caught in his own trap, for the very thing that Christianity rests on to-day is the observance of every seventh day, which is of Christian origin, and he says we Freethinkers should be careful in advocating the abolition of Sunday laws. Now, that is the very argument the Christians present in support of their Christian dogmas. He seems to think that wage-workers are the only ones that should be accommodated, whether they hav a family or not, or whether they would spend the day in some place of amusement. Now, I would say that when we advocate the abolition of Sunday laws we should present the question in its true light. I say that if Mr. Stites is so well satisfied with the Sunday laws as they are he had better remain in the Christian ranks, for he is on the wrong side of the fence to produce that kind of argument, because the compulsory observance of Sunday is the chief corner-stone of Christianity.

He fails to take into account how many there are that are in pursuits on their own account, that do not employ help, who would work if they had plenty of work to do, and rest and recreate when work was slack, but he would compel those to lie idle one-seventh of the time, no matter how much they might hav to do, and how necessary it might be to be done.

He also speaks of liberty. Now, what is there in liberty to compel us to abstain from our industrial pursuits one-seventh of the time?

As to its being essential to the human race to hav every seventh day for rest, would it not also be essential for the horse or other animal that has to perform labor to be turned loose on that day for rest and recreation, because they are similarly physically constituted?

As for the wage-earner's necessity to hav every seventh day off from his regular vocation, it is not a fact, because he only puts in ten (and a great many eight) hours out of the twenty-four, so in the latter case he has two-thirds of every day for rest and recreation, and if every day was at liberty to be used, the hours of labor might be reduced to seven or six instead of ten or eight, and in slack times (which occur always) they could get a day or a week off if they so wished.

And further, to abolish Sunday laws does not prohibit anyone from stopping their business every seventh day, if they so wish.

He says: "You say to the laborer, We intend to abolish Sunday laws and allow men to work, and mills and factories to run, every day in the week alike, and nine out of ten would oppose you." There is no doubt that they would if it was presented in the way he presents it. But present it in its true light, showing liberty and justice to all, and I think there would not be much opposition to the abolition of Sunday laws.

He says it is necessary, if we hav a day of rest, that it be one day in seven, and that one day be observed by all. Now, why should it be one in seven? Could it not just as well be one in six or one in eight, ten, or twelve, or any other number? Now, the seventh-day business smacks too much of Christianity, and he speaks of making every seventh day a legal holiday in which all men must quit work and shut down their mills and close up their stores. Now, he ought to know that we hav other legal holidays which are mostly observed, but there is no law that says you shall not work on those days, but on the other hand it says you cannot be compelled to work on such holidays if you do not see fit; and in some cases you are allowed pay if you do not work on that day.

Now, as to the disposition of the Sunday question, if the people want every seventh day as a day of rest and recreation, make it a legal holiday, the same as other legal holidays, so that people can spend the day as they choose; and, as he says, make that day just what reason and common sense teach it should be. DAN WINELAND.

Chapter from a Struggling Freethinker's Life.

OLIVE BRANCH, MISS., July 25, E.M. 291.

MR. EDITOR: Beneath a shady tree that shelters me from noonday's heat, amid a shower of sunbeams that kiss the boughs and linger lovingly upon the grassy sward, I sit with pen in hand and ink hard by to enjoy the matchless splendor of a beauteous summer day.

Old Nature wears her costliest robes, her coolest breezes blow, and shadows chase each other fast across the open lea; and still I prosy feel and sad, for such is life and nature's will, when sunbeams fall there also shadows come and go. Here by me beneath the cooling shade are all love's strongest ties—a wife as pure as violets, two children like two tender vines that cling around the mother oak. I love my wife, and only those who love can know the picture I would paint. She is my anchor and my all. The church may heap upon my head the dregs of slander's slimy fluid, friends may forsake and foes despise and ignorance malign, but with her bosom bared to the storm, a shrine for virtue, a tomb for every fault of mine, she stands a heroin amid the fury of the storm and says, "Though the streams of his life may at nature's will flow through quagmires and dash against the reefs of wrong, its source is as pure and clear as any bubbling spring." She is a Christian. She prays for me. And I hav answered every prayer but one. My reason, once set free, can nevermore crouch trembling between the narrow walls of Christian creeds. I am at present in disrepute and she is grieved. I hav been to Sunday-school again, and, bearding lions in their dens, hav given out two scores of tracts to boys and girls in tender teens. And I hav been more wicked still. We had a lyceum, you know, and now the lyceum is no more. I was accused of actually delivering four "Infidel" lectures before the club and shamming them off for debates on subjects like wine and war. And I hav been more wicked still. 'Tis said that when the "dear pastor" came to squelch in his address "The 'Infidel's' blasphemous vaporings," I was there and stood right up and spoke right out until his beloved wits were quite benumbed. They say that when he said that "Infidelity is hypocrisy" I told him plainly that disbelief arose from honest doubt, and that amid the honest doubters were men of hearts more pure "than ever stood between the pulpit's narrow curve." And I hav been more wicked still. I hav been lending books to the deacon's boys, and the deacon's faithful wife has written me a note which runs somewhat like this: "Mr. ———, Sir: Knowing that you understand fully our religious belief, I must say I was somewhat surprised to find two of your books in ——— ——— trunk. I herewith return them, and if you ever send any more of your sacrilegious profanity here again I will unhesitatingly burn it, and seek protection from some other source. I had much rather you would teach a boy of mine to steal a horse than to believe that the resurrection of Jesus Christ is a myth." This kindly note, like the "holy writ," was without a date or signature, or even an amen. Across the back of this inspired epistle I wrote: "Mr. or Mrs. ——— (I don't know which): Whether your note is kind and becoming or not I leave to your cool consideration. As for me, only one favor—don't blame your son. He was not to blame." This lady writes good notes. Here is an extract from one written to me about three years ago: "Dear ———: 'Tis Sabbath morn, and a peaceful calm rests like a holy benediction upon all nature. All are gone to church but me. The pastor said last Sunday that while the men were going to church the women were left at home to bake the pies, and from this task to-day I snatch a moment to write to you. When I heard that Judge B. was sending you to school I thanked God for such men as Judge B. and for such boys as ——— ———. I trust that God intends to make of you a Spurgeon or a J. R. Graves. But one thing sure. Whatever work he has chosen for you, he has given you ability to make it a success." I will thank him for that. I hav decided to turn my little battery against his own citadel, and now that he has given me the ability to make it a success, look out, ye dweller of the skies.

And now, dear friends and readers, I will close these broken remarks. The sun has walked around to where he can see me in the face, and I cannot much longer stand his glaring looks. I hav had the lines pull hard upon me this year, and my crop has been ruined by overflows. I hav been applying myself steadily for some time, and would be much pleased to secure a few lectures in Tennessee, Arkansas, or Mississippi for the summer. Please let me hear from you, friends. My terms will be easy, quite. I want to find what I can do, and if you will aid me you will aid our cause. "GRAY," Box 92, Olive Branch, Miss.

An Enjoyable Chat.

IRWIN, IA., July 4, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Our paper suits me so well that no advantageous change appears possible. I certainly do not mean to indorse everything that it contains; not even all of the editorials. Some rubbish is to be expected where everyone is permitted to express his own views in his own way. Even the greatest thinkers are not always at their best, and sometimes there is a streak of sophistry running its opaque lines right into the very heart of an article that, as a whole, is instructiv.

What has become of McArthur? I do think that his effort to prove that dead folks liv, or "a life beyond the grave," was just as complete and ridiculous a failure as his previous articles on the Roman Catholic religion were solid successes. I miss him and wish that he would "come back again." If he be dead his coming back should be with such power and demonstration as to produce conviction.

The first article under "Notes and Clippings" in the issue of July 4th says that Herbert Spencer declares that he has lost faith in the rationality of men because conclusiv proofs do not change beliefs. It was Spencer's "Biology" and "First Principles" that first lifted the clouds of superstition from my poor enervated mind. Then came Darwin, Huxley, Tyndall, and others. What a sense of intellectual freedom and strength grew within me as the key of science began to unlock to my enraptured mind the mysteries of the universe! These masters gave me worlds upon worlds, ages upon ages! Dear masters, what does it matter to us if some people, or most people, do not or can not see the demonstrated verities, and comprehend the necessary conclusions?

Now I understand how the love of life becomes so strongly developed in all creatures. A race of suicides could not be perpetuated; and those individuals having the strongest love and care for life would survive longest and leave behind the most numerous progeny. So the love of life becomes the strongest sentiment, making the timid brave in its defense. This has led the human imagination to build up a fanciful existence beyond the grave. As long as we love life, and all that makes life a pleasure, we will cling to this dream, even after we know it to be but a dream. At first sight of our destiny it appears to us as "a terrific and overwhelming calamity," and no wonder that we "would vouchsafe to this irreparable loss the decencies of mourning" (Gladstone, "Order of Creation," p. 40). Without claiming it as a great merit I confess to being a fellow-mourner with "England's Grand Old Man." We are all built that way. It is the very tenure by which we obtain and retain life that we should prize it and bewail its loss. Yet may not philosophy offer us better consolation for our bereavement than was ever invented by faith or fiction?

> Lo, on a narrow neck of land
> 'Twixt two unbounded seas we stand,
> Yet how insensible.

Before us stretches the eternity of the future, and if we are not to be "in it," we all feel that it is an irreparable loss; behind us lies the eternity of the past and we all know we were not in it, and yet we feel no concern, or any sense of loss whatever. In fact, we congratulate ourselvs that our lives did not fall in any part of it but in the better present. But why is it not just as reasonable to go into "the decencies of mourning" because we were not present to hear the stellar anthem at creation's dawn? Simply, as I think, because we are built that way. Our eyes to weep with are set in front, and they come to be set that way because if by any accident they had got into the back of the head we would not hav come forward into existence at all; we would hav gone backward into extinction of being. This love of life may sustain the race in an endless existence, but the individuals do die. That is to us a sad fact. I do not remember ever having heard or read this idea of a loss of a past eternity of existence considered and compared with the idea of a loss of an eternity of future existence. If I am an original raving fool, can't somebody lift my hair and let light in there?

Now, against the theory of a preëxistent intelligent creator I hav what I consider a conclusiv argument. Likewise I hav never heard nor seen it; yet I am aware that there is scarcely anything original in this age but original sin, and we are said to get even that "second-hand." Here is my argument: If God created all things, then before he created anything there was nothing to think about. To think about nothing is not to think at all. Things are the necessary elementary foundation of all intelligence. Hence an infinit vacuum could not furnish an intelligent God or anything. The microcosm is the result of the macrocosm. The outer world is necessary to the inner world. The creation must precede thought, intelligence; or we must abandon the theory of a creation, the existence of a veritable material universe, altogether. To substitute a preëxistent homogeneous matter at creation's dawn—coëxistent with God—does not help the Theist out; for an infinit homogeneous mass is just as impossible material for wisdom's house as is an infinit vacuum—neither more nor less. Even if we suppose that the eternal elementary matter was, before the creativ act, not absolutely "void and without form," but was in that self-sustained, formativ condition of crude, unrelated parts to which the name chaos has been given, the resulting intelligence of this assumed creator must be of the same confused, chaotic character. Perhaps I hav not put my thought in its best form of expression, but it seems to me to be of that kind that Spencer would call "conclusiv proof." If it is not I cannot see why it is not.

Your paper is all right. I like the whole business—even to Peck's peccable pecks; let him peck away. What an invincible iconoclast! What a perfect tornado of destructiv argument! Then there is Heston! We just can't enjoy good health if you leave his pictures out. Then such weighty matter as Boynton, Priestly, and others contribute givs us intellectual strength. The "Children's Corner" we greatly prize, and as a father of several young Freethinkers I wish to emphasize my deep appreciation of this department. The "Letters from Friends" must add much to the popularity of the paper. They are good reading, and I think you get them in about right. Giv the politicians some room—not too much. Let in well-written articles of all kinds, no matter how wild in theory. Prohibition is a disastrous failure in Iowa and a demoralizing and costly experiment. I am a total abstainer (without pledge), but an anti-Prohibitionist. We will repeal the law with a rush in Iowa. But giv both sides a chance. Even let the Christian, if he can write well, hav his little say. We aren't afraid of anything. Some papers are spoiled with too much "culture," others are decidedly coarse and out of decent taste. "Our paper" is just about O. K. J. K. P. BAKER.

Children's Corner.

Edited by Miss Susan H. Wixon, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for his Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

The Wind and the Flowers.

Once a breeze ran out a-moaning,
And threw herself into the stream,
And the prairie flowers, in dewy showers,
Came calling as in a dream;
Softly, tearfully, haunting the dells,
With a voice that sang like lone farewells.

And every cloud o'er the wheat field
Dropped down on the grass and wept,
Where blooms like the sun their yellow silk spun,
Then out on the prairies slept;
Entreating them as a mother might
Whose children were lost in the dews at night.

No May-apple thrust her parasol
Into the hollows of shining sand,
She never at least left her house in the east,
To dwell out in a desert land;
But the sky spread a tent o'er the flowers asleep,
And the breeze came up from the ocean to weep.

The lark sang into the midnight.
I listened, for I was alone,
And I heard the rain at the window pane,
Like a misty garment blown.
Till I cried, while the wind blew out of the west:
"Would all of my own were here in the nest."

Mary Baird Finch.

My Last Game of Ball.

A PIONIC STORY.

Not more than half a dozen years ago a social party was got together and plans completed for spending a day in the country. A very pretty semi-private park near Flushing, L. I., was selected, a few pieces of music hired, and it was settled by the committee of arrangements that toward the cool of the evening we should hav a game of our glorious national pastime, baseball. I was unanimously chosen as a member of one of the contesting nines. "I shall not even think of it," I declared emphatically. "I don't know a home run from a strike, and besides that I am altogether too near-sighted. I could not hit the ball unless I used a foot-wide piece of timber." "That's all right," rejoined my friend. "We're all in the same boat. There isn't a decent player in the party with the exception of George Vincent, and we'll keep him in the background as much as possible. I'll see if I can't hav you made the left fielder. There is little or nothing to do there, and you will hav an elegant chance to show off before the ladies." That last inducement was too great to be resisted, and so in an evil moment I yielded. In due season the momentous day rolled around, and an ideal day it was—cool, clear, and crisp. In fact, as one of the party somewhat tritely said, if it had been made to order it could not hav been better. Well, we all boarded the cars bright and early in the morning and rode out to the grove, intent on having a long, jolly day in the country. There was about two score of us—twenty gentlemen and an equal number of ladies—each of the latter having a male escort. We took it for granted that our party would be about the only witnesses of the game, but therein we had reckoned without our host, or rather our host's son, Sammy Looker, the grove-owner's twelve-year old son. That young gentleman had busied himself for some days previous in telling the neighbors for miles around all about us, and the result was that when the game was called we had a more or less critical audience of at least half a thousand to watch our performance. He also took almost infinit pains to point the writer out as an ex-member of the New York League Club temporarily out of an engagement. Naturally, I became the center of attraction, the shining star of the occasion, so to speak, and great things were expected of me. I happened to be the last batter of the nine, and as our players knew about as much of the game as I did, i.e., almost nothing, they were put out in ding-dong order. At the close of the third inning I took my place at the home plate and picked up the bat as though it were an old-time friend. Candor compels me to confess that the remarks of the spectators could by no possibility be construed as flattering. Being exceedingly short-sighted, I am under the inconvenient necessity of wearing glasses, and a number of the onlookers referred to me in distinctly audible tones as "Four eyes," "Gig lamps," "Specsy," etc. My size, or rather want of size, also came in for unfavorable comment, and such remarks as "Ah, there, skinny," "Anti-fat," and "Hello, lathy," were numerous. I tried hard not to lose my temper, but I confess to being somewhat irritated, and so, when the ball came within striking distance, I made a strike at it that would hav knocked it nearly out of sight if I had hit it. Unfortunately the "stick" did not come within two feet of it, and the force of my blow whirled me around like a teetotum. In a mad endeavor to recover my equilibrium I lost it entirely and fell on my head, thereby smashing a pair of gold-bowed eyeglasses. A loud laugh followed this exhibition of ball-playing, and with a heart full of bitterness I picked up the bat again, after putting on another pair of glasses. The second ball was sent in, and if the pitcher intended to hit me he made an excellent shot. It did hit me just below the belt and with a grunt and a gasp I doubled up. There was another roar of laughter, and I was advised to use pain killer and St. Jacob's oil.

Disdaining any reply, I picked up the bat for the third time and struck at the fast-approaching ball. By some miraculous chance I caught it full and fair on the end of the bat. There was a yell of applause and I started like mad for the first base. My myopia kept me from seeing the ball, but when our captain shouted, "Come home, come home," I gritted my teeth and made a desperate effort to run a little faster. Before I got to first, my cap flew off. Shortly after one of my shoes did the same and dropped down on my uncovered head. It dropped pretty hard, too.

I was getting very warm and tired and concluded that when I reached second I would stop and take a much needed rest, but the captain and the rest of the "Winners" (the name of our nine) were yelling like fiends for me to "Keep it up," "Put on more steam!" "A home run, Ed!" "Run faster, Ed, all the girls are looking at you!" I was completely winded and a stitch in my side seemed to be killing me, but what genuin ball-player cares for such trifles as those? I went puffing and panting past second with the screams and applause of the entire party filling my ears. Just as I passed third my other shoe sailed up in the air. As though guided by a malevolent spirit, it also came down on my head fully as hard as the first one had. Paying no attention to it, however, in my excitement, I let myself out for the home base in my stocking feet. "Make room there!" shouted the crowd. "Look out for the locomotiv!" "Rowell on his las' lap!" "That fellow'll run clean into Suff lk county," etc. By a second miracle I reached the goal just a trifle ahead of the ball, which, however, caught up with me and struck me squarely in the small of the back. As the center-fielder had thrown it with all his might from quite a long distance it assisted me materially in getting there, though I was no way grateful for the assistance. The race being so very close, the crowd had advised me to slide in. This I did, much to the damage of my knee-breeches. I forgot to mention that both nines wore very gorgeous uniforms. Ours wore bright-blue knee-breeches and low-cut shoes. The shirts matched the stockings in color, which were maroon and had a gigantic "W" in front. Altogether our "get-up" was like the darky who painted himself sky-blue, "neat, but not gaudy." Our opponents were somewhat similarly attired, the main difference being in the shirts, which were buff and had a monogram "G. T." worked in front, the "G. T." standing for "Get There." The band was of the curbstone species. Its repertoire was exceedingly limited, consisting in fact of but one piece, "Save My Mother's Picture from the Sale," at that time the song of the day. Still, new though it was, it began to pall upon us after we had heard it a dozen or more times, and gently assuring the leader that I would surely save the picture from the sale and every other disaster that threatened it, I ventured to ask him if he could not play something new. "Dot vas noo," he replied. "Dot vas the ladest oud. Vat you want anyhow, Italian obera from a Dutch band?" This intellectual gem was considered altogether too good to be wasted on a nativ American barbarian, and so with much gesticulation and guffawing he spread it out for the admiration of his fellow-music-murderers; the immediate result being that I was stared at as though I were a weird and wondrous being from another planet.

But to get back to the game. When the umpire decided that I was "safe," and had made a home-run, how the spectators did applaud! Trying hard not to puff like a grampus, and putting on my shoes, which the ubiquitous Sammy Looker brought to me, I strolled over to where my young lady friend was standing as though it was a very commonplace thing indeed for me to make a home-run. She met me with a face beaming with joy. "Oh, Mr. Rousseau, you play magnificently, you do, really. You know how I dote on the game, and if our club loses it will spoil the picnic for me." I then remembered that she was a good deal of a "crank" on baseball, and thanked my lucky stars I had acquitted myself so creditably. Sammy Looker also beamed with joy. For some reason he regarded me as his protegé, and if it had been himself that made the home-run, he could not hav been more pleased. He gave it as his unbiased opinion that I was a corker, and would do even more wonderful things before the game was ended. That boy must hav been inspired. At all events he was the truest prophet I ever met.

Well, the game continued with varying fortunes until the fifth inning. In that inning a "red-hot" one came sailing through the air toward me. I danced around like a pea on a griddle, and after catching the ball, not knowing what to do with it, I held it in my hands. The captain excitedly asked me why in confusion I didn't send in that ball, so I made a terrific throw toward home-base to put out a "Get There," who was rushing in from third. If I had sent the ball thirty feet nearer to the catcher he might possibly hav caught it. As it was it came to a "short stop" on Sammy Looker's waistcoat, catching him between "wind and weather," and he was kept so busy sniveling for the rest of the game he had no time to devote to me. Naturally my hard work began to tell on me, and in consequence of a feeling as if half my ribs were dislocated, I struck out pretty much all the time after that, but as I had plenty of company in that sort of thing, I did not mind it very much. The score at this time was even, and the game being so close the interest, of course, was intensified. In all such games the scores are absurdly high, and so, at the beginning of the ninth inning, we had twenty-seven runs to our credit, and our opponents twenty-five. If they succeeded in getting two runs, the game would be tied. If we could only "Chicago" them, the game would be ours. If they got three runs the game would not be ours. Our captain, trembling with excitement, implored us all to keep perfectly calm and collected, and under no circumstances to lose our nerve. "Keep your nerve," he warned us at least three dozen times. We all promised to retain that inestimable possession and individually and collectivly resolved to die before we parted with it. The first ball struck dropped plump into the ready hands of the pitcher, who sent it whizzing to first-base to head off the batter. The baseman caught it as handily as the pitcher had. Result, one man out; no runs. The second striker sent a "daisy cutter" over toward center-field and before the ball was fielded in succeeded in reaching second. However, it did not do him much good, as, thoughtlessly stepping off the base a foot or two, the baseman—who had the ball in his hand—tapped him on the shoulder and demanded judgment. Of course the umpire had to declare the man out. The "Winners" were still ahead. The next three strikers got their bases by careful play, and this left all the bases filled. At this critical juncture the captain again implored us in sobbing accents not to lose our nerve. We took a second deep breath and re resolved to die before we would do that. The next man at the bat sent a beautiful ball up into the air, and I felt sure from the direction it took it was "mine." I was never more self-possessed in my life. In fact, I was so sure of catching that ball that I had no chance to get nervous. "Now, then, left-field, that's yours." "Don't muff, left-field," was yelled at me from all sides, while clear and distinct over all the tumult rose the agonized voice of the captain beseeching me not to lose my nerve. Of course the "G. T.'s" shrieked and screamed in an effort to make me lose it, but my equanimity was too strong and sublime to be influenced by anything so small as that. "Say, fellers, didn't I tell yer he was a corker? Just watch him grab that ball in regular professional style," yelled Sammy Looker, who had stopped sobbing in his excitement. "Get back, there," I shouted. "Get back. Don't crowd me! Give me room!" They all gave me plenty of room. The cries and calls became hushed and players and audience waited in silence to see the magnificent play. Everybody got ready to applaud, not even excepting our opponents. Probably I was the coolest man on the field. I had not lost the slightest jot or tittle of my nerve. I was positiv that I would catch that ball. I was also positiv that I would receive a storm of applause, and remember thinking how pleased my fair companion would be. I braced myself firmly on my feet, and kept my glass-aided eyes on the sphere as it came tearing through the air like a runaway comet. "Get back, there," I cried again. "This is my ball." Straight as a plummet the ball came down into my hands.

* * * * * * *

And straight as a plummet it went through them and hit me a terrific bang on my somewhat prominent nose. I don't know how many stars hav been discovered in infinit space, but I am almost sure I saw all of them at once. The yells and shrieks of laughter were almost deafening. I jumped hastily to my feet and commenced looking for my eyeglasses. These were so bent as to be worse than useless, and by the time I had put on my last remaining pair the three men on the bases had leisurely walked in, and the batter made a home run. Consequently the "Winners" were the losers, and the "Get There's," to speak slangily, "got there." The captain came over and told me sorrowfully that in spite of his warnings I had lost my nerve. I also heard the voice of Sammy Looker loudly inquiring "if anybody had ever seen such a duffer as that four-eyed bloke," while right behind me, shaking with mirth, was a motherly-looking old country-dame who "swanned to gracious that that 'ere city dood was as good as a circus for fun." My nose was swollen and bleeding, I had two pair of broken eye-glasses to hav mended, and my fair companion, vexed with what she called my clownishness, treated me with a marked degree of frigidity. Do you wonder, gentle reader, that that was my last game of ball? Edwards Rousseau.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. Price 25 cents.

News of the Week.

THE London Times correspondent at St. Petersburg writes: "An innocent pamphlet on the Jewish question has been ordered to be burnt by the entire committee of the czar's orthodox ministers. Many persons think that if the present fanatical policy is continued, human beings will soon meet a similar fate."

JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL died on the 12th.

REV. WM. PERRY, of Bowling Green, Ky., was providentially stricken dead while preaching on Sunday the 2d.

NINE hundred Jews in Russian Poland were ordered to embrace orthodoxy or leave. They assembled in their synagog and declared for the latter alternativ, and left in two days.

AT the Swiss celebration of the William Tell festival at Berne an Englishman was slapped in the face and forced to make a public apology for doubting the existence of the great patriot.

CARDINAL PARROCHI, the pope's vicar-general, favors modifying the demand for restitution of all former papal territory to a request merely for Rome—that Rome should become an independent, international Catholic city.

CROPS in Russia hav failed, and starvation is imminent. That highly Christian land has no stores for time of need, no money, and the worst foreign credit of any nation. Crops are short throughout Europe, and American grain will be in demand.

JOASH'S POLYGAMY IS ALL RIGHT IN THE SIGHT OF THE LORD.

And Joash did that which was right in the sight of the Lord all the days of Jehoiada the priest. And Jehoiada took for him two wives: and he begat sons and daughters.—2 Chron. xxiv, 2, 3.

THE International Labor Congress at Brussels will be agitated by conflicts between moderate and ultra Socialists.

EDITOR STEAD, of London, calculates that 800,000,000 prayers for the prince of Wales are annually offered by Church of England and other officials, yet, cries the editor, after fifty years of such prayers, behold the gambling scene at Tranby Croft!

EDWARD FOSTER, of Brooklyn, three years ago had a small red pustule appear on his lower lip. His wife begged him to consult a physician, but he, being a devout faith-cure believer, said that God would heal the sore in his own good time. The cancer has now spread over his face and neck.

BISHOP FAVA of Grenoble, France, who is pushing the new Catholic scheme of reconciliation and coöperation with the republic, has established a Catholic political party. He says: "It is the Catholic party that conquered Bismarck; it is the Catholic party that triumphed over the Masonic party of Belgium; it is the Catholic party that sustains Ireland in her struggles against Protestant England."

LEO XIII. dispatched a nuncio to France, saying: "Neglect nothing that may be the means of uniting the church with the republic." The nuncio was escorted to President Carnot's headquarters by dragoons and a numerous suite of government officials in uniform. He presented his credentials as representativ of the pope in France, and the union of church and republic is now looked upon by some as begun.

THE bishop of Treves has announced the genuinness of the Holy Coat, saying: "It is the same coat which the son of God wore on his wanderings through the towns and villages of Palestine, which he moistened with his sweat, which he wetted with his precious blood. A miraculous power went forth from it, as was publicly declared by the woman who had an issue of blood twelve years, and was suddenly cured of the malady (St. Luke viii, 44). I may confidently invite you, my dear brethren, to venerate this relic as our Lord's seamless coat."

EX-PRIEST CHINIQUY, delivering anti-Catholic lectures at Escanaba, Mich., on the 5th was mobbed and knocked down. Two men who drew weapons to protect him were arrested, and one of them, having fired, was held for attempt at murder. The next night the Opera House was surrounded and an attempt to frighten people made by a fire-alarm and shooting outside. On the 7th the mayor called a special council meeting and ordered, through posters, that Chiniquy forbear speaking, directing the police to execute the order. Chiniquy obeyed, but will contest his right to speak. His adherents petitioned the governor for troops, but they were not sent, as the city and county officials did not request them.

Gems of Thought.

THE foolish and the dead alone never change their opinion.—Lowell.

A SOT,
Because into a gown and pulpit got,
Though surfeit-gorged, and reeking from the stews,
Nothing but abstinence for his theme will choose.—Juvenal.

LET it be distinctly understood, that Christianity has made ten lunatics—twenty—one hundred—where it has provided an asylum for one. Mr. Talmage also speaks of the hospitals. When we take into consideration the wars that hav been waged on account of religion, the countless thousands who hav been maimed and wounded, through all the years, by wars produced by theology—then I say, that Christianity has not built hospitals enough to take care of her own wounded—not enough to take care of one in a hundred.—Ingersoll.

WHAT a terrible waste of intellect there is in the world, arising from this assertion, that the Bible is the word of God and contains a harmonious system of final truth! When the powers that are now used to defend theories concerning the scriptures are directed toward positiv explorations of nature's secrets, how the world will spring forward! When theological seminaries become science schools, and look for truth in living facts, they will be greater boons to the world.—Robert C. Adams.

MEN will wrangle for religion; write for it; fight for it; die for it; anything but—liv for it.—Colton.

HE that wrongs his friend
Wrongs himself more, and ever bears about
A silent court of justice in his breast,
Himself the judge and jury, and himself
The prisoner, at the bar, ever condemn'd.
—Tennyson.

PASSIV submission to insult and ill-treatment cannot be regarded as good morality. To submit to insult or ill-treatment when they can be resisted and prevented is a sign of weakness or folly. Such conduct givs the ruffian the power to ride rough-shod over his weaker brethren whenever opportunity allows.—Arthur B. Moss.

YOU must hav been enriched by your solitary walk over the mountains. I suppose that I feel the same awe when on their summits that many do on entering a church. To see what kind of earth that is on which you hav a house and garden perchance! It is equal to the lapse of many years. . . . Just as awful, really, and as glorious, is your garden.—Thoreau.

How is it possible that religious conviction can find its way to our hearts when we hear the absurd language, and witness the acts of iniquity, of the greater number of those whose business it is to preach to us? I am surrounded by priests who repeat incessantly that their kingdom is not of this world, and yet they lay hands upon everything that they can get. The pope is the head of that religion from heaven, and yet he thinks only of this world.—Napoleon Bonaparte.

AUGHT, aught of mightiest, best I see, conceive, or know,
(To break the stagnant tie—thee, thee to free, O soul,)
Be thou my God.
All great ideas, the races' aspirations,
All heroisms, deeds of rapt enthusiasts,
Be ye my Gods.
Or Time and Space,
Or shape of Earth divine and wondrous,
Or some fair shape I viewing, worship,
Or lustrous orb of sun or star by night,
Be ye my Gods.—Walt Whitman.

BEFORE we can hope to redeem the victims of the poison-vender [the liquor-dealer], we must learn to make virtue more attractiv than vice. We must counteract the attractions of the rum-shop by inviting reforming topers, not to the whining conventicles of a Sabbath-school, but to temperance gardens, resounding with music (dance music, if "sacred concerts" should pall) and the jubilee of romping children, and shortening summer days with free museums, picture galleries, swings, ball grounds, and foot-race tracks. The gods of the future will contrive to outbid the devil.—Oswald.

TRYING TO GET THERE—BLIND LEADERS OF THE BLIND.

Notes and Clippings.

A CATHOLIC journal has brought into juxtaposition these pious flings at Bruno: "A ragamuffin in religion" (Mazzachelli). "An illustrious fanatic" (Cromaziano). "He universally discredited the speculativ sciences" (Gioberti). "A hysteric" (Barbieri). "A visionary" (Giannoni). "A second-hand excubitator of worn-out theories" (Stiavelli).

IT has recently been suggested with great seriousness by a responsible minister of the gospel, that if only more women were licensed to preach the congregations would be greatly increased. One might venture to surmise that the increase in the congregation would depend very much upon the young woman preacher. Everyone knows what an all-attractiv magnet a handsome young clergyman is to the unmarried damsels of a country parish. It would not be extraordinary if a beautiful girl in the pulpit should prove similarly magnetic. But will the men be drawn solely by the spirit of religion, or will the end altogether justify the means, even if all the worshipers are onverted?—Sun.

THE New York Evening Post remarks that while the failure "of Sunday statutes is conspicuous in Connecticut, there is no doubt that the situation is nearly the same in many states of the Union whose statute-books are lumbered up with a great mass of laws by no means confined to Sunday. Whether in the long run it pays to retain these old statutes for the sake of a very few extreme offenses under them, and keep the people as a whole in constant contact with violated laws which therefore shadow better ones and, in a sense, tend to familiarize lawlessness, is a question as old as debating clubs, jurisprudence, and civilization."

COMMISSIONER MORGAN of the Indian schools thus continues his reproach to Father Chappelle of the Catholic mission bureau: "Those in your employ in the field and others instigated apparently by the attitude of the bureau, hav endeavored directly and indirectly to hinder the efforts of the government in its beneficent work of educating and civilizing the Indian through its own appropriate means. These influences, emanating from your bureau, hav been in some respects at least hurtful, and it is certainly not its fault that the government schools hav not been crippled, or even destroyed. While drawing hundreds of thousands of dollars of government funds to build up and sustain the mission schools under your charge, your bureau has thrown the whole weight of its influence against the government upon whose bounty it subsisted."

SAYS an exchange: "The persecution of a Seventh Day Adventist in Tennessee because he worked in his field on Sunday is a singular proceeding for an American state. Nobody pretends that this victim of religious intolerance was disturbing his neighbors. He was plowing on his own land at a distance from any place of worship. A local contemporary thinks that Tennesseeans hav a right to wreak religious bigotry on minorities in this fashion, and that if the members of the minority do not like it they can do as the Jews are doing in Russia—giv up their homes and leave. That is not the common idea of American liberty. The principle at the root of our government is that every man has a right to do as he pleases so long as he does not infringe the rights of anybody else. The attempt to confine a Seventh Day Adventist to five days' work a week when other people are allowed to work six is a discrimination so unjust that it ought to make a Tennesseean ashamed to acknowledge his state."

CANADIAN NEWS: The Papal Zouaves are the volunteers who flocked to Rome from all parts of the Catholic world with the object of saving the Eternal City from falling into the hands of the troops of Victor Emmanuel. Canadian Catholics were among the foremost of the nations owing spiritual allegiance to the pope to rally to the call of General de La Charette, commander of the body for the world. When Count Mercier was in Rome Pope Leo XIII. intrusted to him a number of medals to be distributed among the Canadian Zouaves. The Papal Zouaves comprised many prominent Frenchmen but in parliament at every session English-speaking members hav brought up motions for their suppression, on the ground that they are an armed and foreign force in the dominion of Canada supported by the government in contradiction to the spirit of the British North American act. As a matter of fact the Papal Zouaves are an armed body, subject to the call of the head ecclesiastic in the province of Quebec or the pope of Rome. The present trouble has arisen out of Premier Mercier's determination to hav the distribution of medals take place at his private residence. He invited Bishop Lafleche to distribute the medals, but his lordship curtly refused, declining because of complaints made against him at Rome by Premier Mercier, who stated to the pope that Bishop Lafleche had unduly meddled in the politics of the province. The bishop had worked against Count Mercier at the last election.

WHEN for reasons so strong as inability through poverty to secure the railway ticket, Jews notified to leave Russia do not start at the time appointed, they are thrown in prison and then conveyed to the Pale by étape. Those who hav lived for twenty years or more in Moscow hav been coerced to decamp within twenty-four hours. Their furniture is sold for the most ridiculously small prices, beds, tables, chairs, and such household effects going for a few pennies. In the expulsion by étape, those who hav not through poverty been able to secure railway transportation for themselvs are put in with criminals and forced to make the journey on foot, bound with chains, two by two. Some of those who are thus sent from St. Petersburg to the Pale hav to begin life over again in that section, as the practice of the profession which they hav exercised is forbidden there. It may easily be seen what this means for a man with a family, and who has attained more than middle age. So long as the victims hav money, they can secure some petty show of mercy from officials by submitting to the extortions of a blackmailing levy upon them. Fires are of frequent occurrence in the Jewish houses since the publication of the edicts against them. This incendiarism is due to the spirit of hatred which these aggressiv measures on the part of the government hav aroused among the people against the Jews.

Address to Foreign Missionaries.

My friends say that I am against everything popular. To some extent they are correct. I am for right and I am sure that right's ideal is not popularity. I am not adverse to good morals, spotless characters, and happy lives; nor am I adverse to wholesome food, good clothes, beautiful homes, and a delightful Sabbath morning stroll with my wife and children through the quiet of the pathless woods, among birds and flowers, to the busy brooklet where sinless songs of cheer and love are sung alike to king and peasant. For these every impulse of my soul leaps forth with eagerness. At their service is my every nerve, my power, my blood. But counter to these most noble American ideas is that infamous scheme of robbers known as Foreign Mission Work, against which the musket of my vengeance is shouldered loaded to the muzzle with minie-balls of rancor.

We can but censure the leaders of this great monopoly, for the populace as a rule are always ready and willing with wide-open mouths to be stuffed and duped by any story which seems as plausible as that of Elijah or Romulus and Remus. When Mohammed said he was God's prophet, the people cried "Amen." When Swedenborg told of his conversations with spirits and angels, his ignorant dupes declared, "Truth, truth! as pure as a mountain dew-drop." When the "Bible bigot," John Wesley, stepped upon the religious stage, the people shouted themselvs hoarse. His followers to this day keep up this foolish shouting, the reason for which methinks they themselvs but see as "through a glass darkly." When Andrew Fuller, the "Sledge-hammer" and, as his proselytes term him, the "Franklin of Theology," the originator of the plan of salvation by foreign missions, said, "Let us off to India, plant a few vines, and start a little Lord's vineyard there," the people (and I guess a few of them were honest) answered loudly, "We will go, we will go," but added lowly, "for a thousand dollars per annum."

In the light of reason and common sense I believe it needless here to adduce any proof of the ideality of this principle: "The greatest happiness of the greatest number." Happiness is the light-house to which the ship of every life is steered. Though happiness be but a mirage, on the buoy of hope the zephyr of time kisses us on toward it till we, fainting, fall asleep in sweet repose till death. Deluded laborers in the vineyard of the Lord, are you guided by divine authority?—by his holy (?) word? If so, please allow me to call your attention to one or so passages of your "guide"-book. Christ said, "I came not to send peace, but a sword." Again he said, "No man can come to me, except the Father which hath sent me draw him, and I will raise him up at the last day." I see no "peace and good will to man" in the first declaration, nor do I see any need of heathen conversion in the latter.

Mission-workers, are you not aware that the Bible has been the occasion of more crime and bloodshed than all other books combined? Do you not know the Bible has been the city of refuge for centuries to criminals of all colors? Its brass gates in its walls of adamant hav stood ajar more than eighteen centuries for the liar, the thief, and the murderer. The Crusades were born of the teachings of this book. In my judgment the Crusades were the great prototype of your present work. They marched with a cross, a he-goat, and a goose for their color and their protection. Seven times they went under the shield of their banner and their God against the heathen Mohammedans, and seven times they were defeated. By the divine guidance of the Bible on one side and the Koran on the other, there was enough blood shed in this outrageous conflict to crimson deep the vault of heaven. There was enough time and money spent to well educate every American youth. The Spanish Inquisition! Oh, horror of horrors! While the nimble fingers of falsehood were writing on every page of history I would that they had portrayed every black and brutal crime of this hellish institution. For seven centuries this infamous tribunal drank the innocent blood of hundreds of thousands. Think of the seventy thousand murdered in the massacre of St. Bartholomew. The pages of biography which tell us of the burning of Bruno and Servetus are blacker than the smoke that arose from the fire that roasted them. In those days one could not be a worthy "follower of the Lamb" unless he had offered up a heretic or so to his merciful father. Missionary, stop! hold! consider just a moment. The doctrin that you are pushing to heathen shores gave life to all this iniquitous opprobrium.

Do conversion to Christianity make happier the heathen? I cannot think one less happy than a duped heathen in his lonesome, isolated folly. It makes them to realize, "All is vanity and vexation of spirit."

In your precipitant zeal hav you ever stopped to foot up the cost, per capita, of conversions from paganism to Protestantism? The New York Examiner (the leading missionary paper of the world) says that during the year 1884 it cost $592.03 to make a pagan an Episcopalian; $231 91 a Presbyterian; $117.91, a Methodist; and only $37.05, a Baptist, etc.; being more than $200 for each conversion from Confucius. "Hav no depraved thoughts" to a full fellowship with "Let mine adversaries be clothed with shame." Think of the money, clothing, and bread you are taking from the poor of this country to them that laugh and scorn at your senseless folly. There is one class of poor, among a thousand others, in this country to which I wish to call the especial attention of your misdirected philanthropy. This class is the half-clad and half-starved factory girls and boys. Less than $200 for each will redeem and save them, save them with an earthly salvation which we know will benefit them here and now. We need them in this world, and if God needs them in another, I hav faith enough in him to believe he will prepare them for his kingdom. If you hav not this much confidence in the merciful father you had better look up another master—but maybe you hav found another already in your foreign mission treasury. To every dollar you giv a heathen, can you not giv these needy slaves at least a ginger-cake, and a suit of clothes or a gingham dress while $100 go to China? When, dressed in silken clothes and your pockets heavy with gold, it is your sad lot to pass among a throng of these woe-stricken sons and daughters of American liberty, on your way to embark for heathen lands, I beg, with a wailing cry, that you drop a few loaves of bread among them that they may yet be alive when you return.

If you had $1,000 000,000 and gave it to the destitute of this God-blessed (?) land, there would still be suffering about us. I know "few love to hear of the sins they love to act," but if there is a blacker sin under the sun than your mission work, I am yet unable to believe it. America, or the United States, in my judgment, is mission ground enough for every soldier under your holy (?) banner. Here in the paradise of all the world are hundreds and thousands who are limping about under the burden of ignorance and hypocrisy. To these, and to these only, need you apply your "balm in Gilead." You must preach to empty heads or empty pews.

You are sent to heathen lands to "preach the gospel to every creature," but Elder P. D. Gold, a power in the old-school Baptist church of this country, says, "We do not believe the missionary Baptists preach the gospel here at home. They deny the power of God here, and as people are not apt to act better out of sight than in sight, we do not suppose they preach any better away from home."

If an omnipotent being with power to speak the universe into existence does not whisper his law into the hearts of a people I take it for granted they do not need it. If Christ needed you to help carry on his business, why did he not say so while on earth? A wise and wealthy gentleman on being asked how he made his money, replied, "One half by attending to my own business, the other half by letting other people's alone." Let God's business alone. I would not bend my knees nor bow my head to a God whom I could help.

I waited till I entered the threshold of this life before I went about its duties; so I thought I would wait till the dawn of the morning that givs me a new being before I go about its pleasures. Let the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob look after the spiritual blessings of the Chinese, Burmese, etc., while you look to the joy and happiness of your fellow-countrymen and particularly that of yourself, so that it may not be said to you, "Physician, heal thyself." With gratitude your help will be received here. Your money is what will benefit. Methinks your doctrin is but little needed anywhere, but I hav never yet seen a mission zealot that would not giv two doctrins for $1.

The Chinese are calling for more Bibles; they want them for fuel to cook their rice. If they actually need fuel at your hands and Bibles are cheaper than coal, I can but wish you God-speed. I know they will burn well, for they are so dry. But, again, if your holy writ is cheaper after paying freight on it to China than wood is there, how much cheaper must it be here without the freight than any other fuel we can burn! Here in the "sunny Southland" we need but little fuel, but I will say to the American Bible Society, "Please send me at once by first fast freight three cars of your publications C.O.D."

Next I will ask, Is your work a success, i.e., to your cause? Of course I will admit that it is a success to those you send out with a salary of more than a $1,000 per annum, but as a whole there never was so large an investment with such scanty returns. As India was the first mission field chosen by Mr. Fuller, and to-day is admitted to be the most important and vigorously cultivated of any, we will consider some of its results. Mr. Bainbridge, a weighty name in missionary work, said that "these Indian schools teach science mainly and that evangelization was of subordinate importance." Further, he says that "out of every fifty young men educated by these schools all but two or three graduate as Infidels and scoffers at all religions." Again, "India's great and growing demand for skepticism, etc., is being met by enormous translations from Darwin, Paine, Huxley, Spencer, Mill, and a number of others. Is this for the cause of Christ? You had better call a little louder; I fear your God is asleep. "Thrice armed is he who hath his battle just." Is your battle just? Your labors answer with the reverberating thunder-claps of truth from the mountain peaks of science, "No, no, no!" However, we tender you our sincere thanks for your mission schools in India.

It is no wonder that these heathens think it expedient to establish schools of reform in so-called Christian lands; for when you were groveling in sackcloth and ashes to a God you never knew, and one that never knew you, these "heathens" were calculating eclipses, erecting cities and pyramids and statues.

Not long since, I asked a prominent lady of your faith and order, "If foreign missions are requisit to the salvation of the heathen, what became of the countless millions that perished under the delusiv (?) teachings of Confucius, Zoroaster, and Socrates?" "Oh," she answered, "of course without the law there can be no transgressors." If in carrying the law and prophets among this benighted people you make them liable for their sins, for the redeemer's sake you had better stay at home.

Now, in conclusion, let me entreat you that even a demigod is better able to attend to his matters than you are for him. The Bible is translated into one dialect in twenty-four, and if it is the will and purpose of the munificent omnipresent I Am to further the translations and circulation of his book, you need not doubt his doing it and doing it without your help. But when any all-wise being (though I hav never seen one yet) fits up and equips with men and rations a huge missionary vessel bound for heathen shores by the eager winds of heaven, then, and not till then, will I humbly pray to be a servant on this vessel. Then in it a servant's seat would be a throne to me.

"Is Prayer Answered?"

Prayer is a request, a desire, and nobody doubts for a moment but what a request or desire may come to pass. Not because it was a prayer, but because we desired that which is in accordance with nature. Being Agnostic, we doubt whether a prayer in the Christian sense was ever answered. People may hav a desire and that which they pray for may come, and they may so deceive themselvs as to believe their prayer was answered. But it so happened that they prayed for that which would hav been without the prayer. While some prayers may hav been realized, fully as many, offered in just as good faith, hav failed to materialize. Christ prayed that the bitter cup (death) might pass from him, but it did not pass. John the Baptist prayed for liberty, but the ax took off his head in answer. England prayed that America might be subdued, but a few Infidels said, "We will hav liberty for our children," and we hav it. The entire nation, yea, Christian, and we might say heathen world, prayed that Garfield might be healed. Was one prayer answered? "The prayer of the righteous availeth much." Is it possible there were none righteous? During the late war prayers were sent up from North and South, both appealing to God to stand by his own, both talking to their Lord and quoting from the same book. Now here comes in the conflicting testimony.

Both sides claimed they were right, both clung to the Lord's book and quoted him against himself. According to the Bible slavery is wrong, according to the Bible slavery is right. The same may be said of murdering and stealing. What better proof can one want? It does seem that ordinary intelligence could and ought to see very clearly that the whole book is so ambiguous and misleading that to say it is God's word is damnable. We are so glad we hav the book. It teaches the hellish schemes resorted to by the elect. Keep it and teach it as the history of the cruel people that they were.

Eradicate the idea of it being the word of God, and show your children that it is a cunningly devised fable, written by priests paid for by the masses to benefit the caste. Here is what Paine says: "The most detestable wickedness, the most horrid cruelties and greatest miseries that hav afflicted the human race, hav had their origin in this thing called revelation or revealed religion. It has been the most dishonorable belief against the character of divinity, the most destructiv to morality and the peace and happiness of man, that ever was perpetrated since man began to exist.

"It is better, far better, that we admit, if it were possible, a thousand devils to roam at large and preach publicly the doctrin of devils, if there were any such, than that we permit one such impostor and monster as Moses, Joshua, Samuel, and the Bible prophets to come with the pretended word of God in his mouth and hav credit among us." Is there a remedy? Yes; school, glorious free school, will dethrone caste, and where oppression is peace shall be. Teach the book as a history of a bad, murderous, robbing, cut-throat people, and show them (the children) all that was done at the instigation of, or sanctioned by, the priests and prophets, and show them that we are being hoodwinked to-day in like manner, as far as the secular laws will allow. Teach them to discontinue their contributions for the support of these deceivers and doleful hypocrits, that they may become honest, for of all hellish schemes set up by man to terrify and delude the thoughtless, the scheme of salvation is in the lead. While we hav and always will admit the possibility of God revealing his word, we do not believe he has ever spoken to any one or dozen men. We do not think that God speaks in a changeable language that may be revised to suit the sentiments of those who liv at the expense of others, but rather in the exquisit beauty in nature. By the interblending of certain elements—character—the blending ecstasy of two souls, some men and women are imbued with more reason than others and are therefore able to see more beauty in the real word of God than those less fortunate. But all who read this great book (nature) will see and be filled with a desire to do good and be good. The time is here when some men and women object to having God maligned. For example, take the third chapter in the Presbyterian Confession of Faith: "By the decree of God, for the manifestation of his glory, some men and angels are predestined unto eternal life, and others foreordained unto eternal death, and their number is so certain and so definit that it cannot be increased nor diminished."

Is not this a damnable doctrin? Is it not defaming and maligning the creator, besides being a reward for crime? Can any possible good come from it? "Cannot be increased or diminished;" cannot add to or take from. If the number is already fixed what is the use praying or preaching? There can be but one object in getting the non-elect into the church, namely, to support the elect. My friends, if you hav ever associated the creator's name with that most cruel of cruel histories, stop and consider and you will be convinced that those who revise the book and change the decrees and creeds do not believe the Bible is the word of God. "When a man has so far corrupted and prostituted the chastity of his mind as to subscribe his professional belief to things he does not believe, he has prepared himself for the commission of every other crime." We are nearing a deistical belief that needs no mediators; a belief that leads men to teach by example—to honor God by doing good and assisting mankind. God's word is the beauty we behold as we pass along the journey of life, and not a hellish conglomeration of priestly terms that mystify and humiliate the many into the belief that they must needs support the elect or be damned. Good-bye, old confessional-box; good-bye, many deceivers; good-bye, most damnable of all curses; your day is done, your sun is set. You can no longer damn the people because they will not support you. The keys you possess are a myth, and your hell and purgatory is your home. As a man's mind is so is his home. If he has hell in his mind he will hav hell in his home. Yours for home and free schools,

C. S. RANDOLPH.

Letter From Mr. Heywood.

DEAR MR. MACDONALD: Freedom of speech never was more fiercely assailed or sternly exercised than in Boston in 1860–1861. The Garrison Abolitionists had run up the disunion flag here in 1844 and had worked intently seventeen years to break up the federal government as the best way to free the slaves. At last the South said, "Agreed, we'll go;" and Phillips, facing acres of mob violence, bid the Secessionists good-speed in getting out. During all that fearful winter I was one of a body-guard of young men who protected Phillips to and from public halls and upheld the banner of mental liberty. In order to help right to come uppermost and justice to be done, John A. Andrew, governor-elect, wrote a remarkable letter from which Phillips quoted as follows: "The right to think, to know, and to utter, as John Milton said, is the dearest of all liberties. Without this right there can be no liberty to any people; with it there can be no slavery. I care not for the truth or the error of the opinions held or uttered, nor for the wisdom of the words, or the time of their attempted expression, when I consider this great question of fundamental significance, this great right which must first be secure before free society can be said to stand on any foundation, but only on temporary or capricious props. Rich or poor, white or black, great or small, wise or foolish, in season or out of season, in the right or in the wrong, whosoever will speak and whosoever will hear let him hear. And let no man pretend to the prerogativ of judging another man's liberty. In this respect there is, there can be, no superiority of persons or privileges, nor the slightest pretext for any."

This is the platform on which Wright, Seaver, the Footes, the Lelands, Bennett, Wakeman, Mrs. Colman, Andrews, Rawson, and the rest demanded repeal of Comstock's "law" in 1878, and it must continue to be the stamping-ground of all believers in freedom, order, and progress. Dr. Foote quotes you as saying that you will fight for the right of another to differ from you. In this are your intelligence and sincerity apparent; for recognition of another's right to dissent and upset us if he can by honest argument is proof of faith in our own position. The Massachusetts Bill of Rights, the federal and every state constitution, theoretically assert freedom of conscience, speech, and the press, but anyone looking into popular evil, established sin, gets the door slammed in his face; the rogues try to remove us rather than abolish the sin exposed by us; they try to destroy the physician rather than help him cure the ill. When wiser counsels prevail the reformer is seen to be right and the rogues go down. According to the Declaration of Independence it is our right and may be our duty to alter or abolish the government itself. As Governor Andrew said, one has the right to be wrong, to go to hell at his own risk and cost. It is an ineffable impertinence for one to undertake to tell another what he or she may or may not say or do.

In 1872, the first year of its life, the Word demanded repeal of Comstock's "law." The cases of Woodhull, Train, Lant, Foote, Bennett, and of the many others he has assaulted, made the villainy of his "law" more and more apparent. Dr. Foote's "Plain Home Talk" opened the eyes of millions of readers to the importance of the questions of physiology, morals, and hygiene, which he was one of the first to unfold. Yet here come the church pimps, the pious "decoys," who liv by keeping the people superstitious, ignorant, and vicious, with a "law" fiercely limiting right to acquire and impart knowledge; and they now so far control the federal government that reform newspapers of explicit opinions cannot be delivered to regular subscribers in these states! Every guarantee of liberty is struck down, and the terrorism is so intense that there is not an editor in New England, outside of prison, that dare tell the truth.

When in Washington, in March, 1888, I found in the attic of the Capitol the great petition, still there on a roll, which, bearing seventy thousand names, General Butler presented to Congress in 1878 for repeal of Comstock's "law;" in 1889 Hon. Amos Cummings, Democrat, member of Congress, of New York, introduced a bill explicitly demanding repeal. I trust the National Defense Association will reprint and put in circulation the petitions, in order that the people may hav a chance to work for this greatly needed liberation. Caged here now 383 days, as I go from my cell to the shop I see, over the prison wall, the top of Bunker Hill monument, a reminder of faith in freedom once activly insurgent here, yet now, in these opulent states, newspapers are suppressed, editors imprisoned, and Boston has no public word or protest. A paper, misnamed Liberty, is dumb; the brave old Investigator is silent; Zola's "Money," which circulates intact, unhurt, in Paris, is expurgated, mutilated, for fear of vice society censors, in the home of Adams, Hancock, and Garrison! Truth seeking and utterance are your business; so I trust Governor Andrew's words grandly affirming the right of your work will not be unwelcome.

EZRA H. HEYWOOD.

What Is Money?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I notice in THE TRUTH SEEKER of August 15th a very unsatisfactory answer to the above question by J. M. Brown.

That is money which the law makes money, whether gold, silver, or paper. Mr. Brown's position that nothing but metal can be coined is perfectly absurd. Cannot the government put its stamp on paper as well as on metal? Is either money before the government stamp is put on it? Has the United States ever issued any currency that was a full legal tender for all debts public and private that was not always at par with gold or at a premium? Never! The first sixty millions of greenbacks issued by the government were of this kind, and were always at par with gold and sometimes at a premium. And had all the subsequent issues contained the full legal tender clause as the bill passed the House provided, they would always hav been at par with gold or at a premium. But the damphool Senate at the dictation of the convention of bankers assembled at Washington, before whom the damphool committee on finance of the Senate was summoned, dictated to them to put the damnable exception on the back, which the damphools did, which brands them, and all the Senate who voted for it, as damphools and mere pimps of Wall street. And after this these same bankers did all in their power to depreciate these issues which they had induced the government to partially repudiate, and then bought them up at forty or fifty cents on the dollar with their gold, and then induced another damphool Congress, pimps of Wall street, to allow them their full face in United States bonds with semi-annual interest payable in gold and to burn up the greater part of the greenbacks. But as soon after that as John Sherman ordered, contrary to law, that the balance of the greenbacks should be received at par for customs dues, they at once went up to par with gold and hav been there ever since, and sometimes at a premium.

What an absurd quibble Mr. Brown makes over the two words, "make" and "coin." If to coin is not to make, what is it?

To coin is to convert into legal money by a stamp, which can be put on paper better than on metal.

If gold and silver were not in demand for coinage into money what would they be worth in market? Probably about one-fourth of their present fictitious or nominal value, so there you see their intrinsic value. But Mr. Brown has the same folly of Mr. Hertwig of comparing our treasury notes to the French assignats, the Continental paper, and the Confederate currency. The assignats were based on the confiscated lands of the priests and nobles, to which the revolutionary government had no legal title. They were never made a full legal tender and were always much depreciated. They were redeemable in the confiscated lands, and very many located small farms paying for them in assignats. But when the old government was restored, these confiscated lands that remained unsold were restored to their original owners. But the restored government never dared to touch the lands of the small farmers who had paid for them in assignats.

At the close of the Revolutionary war there was three hundred millions of the Continental money outstanding, representing the indebtedness of the people to its holders. It was a just debt for value received, for services and material. Without that money the people could never hav gained their independence. It should hav been made a full legal tender for all debts, public and private, based on the whole wealth of the country, and not on gold and silver. Unfortunately at that time the people had no artisans to coin greenbacks that could not be counterfeited and consequently the English flooded the country with counterfeits that could not be distinguished from the genuin. If at that time the government had given those credits on its books instead of on floating paper, the counterfeits could hav been avoided. But one great folly the people then committed was to base this enormous amount on gold and silver. At that time there was not over five millions of gold and silver in the country on which to base the whole three hundred millions, which would be about seventeen mills on the dollar. Surely that was trying to stand a pyramid on its apex. However, there was never any good reason for not paying that debt. And the government of the United States did finally make appropriations to pay it, so far as the demands at that time could be ascertained.

As to the Confederate currency, the government issuing it was overthrown. Had the Confederate government stood, doubtless it would hav paid all its debts.

A government that issues money and then repudiates it is a fraud and a robber. F. H. MARSH.

A Wail from the Walls of Zion.

Flying straws indicate the direction of the wind. Owing to opinions recently spoken and published here against the Bible and church, the Dahlonega saints hav become much vexed and extremely solicitous for the safety of their old antiquated idol. On last night they held a mass-meeting at the Methodist church to consider what was best to be done under the circumstances. The general agent of the American Bible Society was present as master of ceremonies and chief orator. All other meetings were postponed, and there was a general outpouring of the faithful; as everybody was invited, urged, and importuned to "come out to the help of the Lord." Cheering words were expected from the distinguished mogul of the American Bible Society, yet notwithstanding, his warning utterance carried no hope to the ear of his anxious hearers. He represented Zion in a languishing condition. The love of many had waxed cold, and the interest in God's blessed word was growing less and less. Brazen-faced Infidelity stalked forth defiant, and boldly fulminated its frightful heresies in a manner appalling to contemplate. The finances of the American Bible Society were in a deplorable state, and foreign distribution was not only checked, but many home colporteurs were dismissed for want of funds to pay them. Several others spoke for the Bible and Jesus, and the amount of idiotic, senseless, silly twaddle indulged in was nothing short of a downright disgrace to the grand intellectual age in which we liv. But after all the meeting was a hopeful one to Liberals, as it revealed the fact that the general masses in sentiment, refinement, and decency are outgrowing the contents of that old conglomeration of error, outrage, and obscene [illegible] called the Bible.

The Money Question.

Now, gentlemen, let me tell you what kind of a dollar I want. And a dollar that suits me is good enough for any other man—and altogether too good for a king.

But first let me tell you what kind of a dollar I do not want: I do not want a dollar of gold in any shape you can fix it. Why, bless your soul—if you hav got one, and it has ever been any use to you—I hav got along for almost sixty years without any gold dollars, and I hav got along about as well as the majority.

I do not want a dollar in silver, nor a half-dollar or quarter-dollar in silver. I like the present coinage of dimes, nickels, and cents, for that represents about the normal condition of my purse, and for dimes and pennies, why, "Barkis is willin'."

I do not want a dollar of gold or silver certificates. Some say that it is the best money we hav ever had because it has intrinsic value behind it. Bosh! Intrinsic value!?! Suppose some canoe-loads of nativs from Congo would come up to Washington some fine Sunday morning, sound the treasury, load the swag into their canoes, and pull for home. When in the sea of Sargossa a storm sends the whole outfit to the bottom. Where is the value of your intrinsic? "Ridiculous! Congo! Ridiculous! Such a thing is not even supposable." Ridiculous, do you say—very well, then, suppose Russia, the German empire, and Great Britain form a triple allience (stranger things than that hav happened) and slyly send over their navies, cut the Atlantic telegraph, and pounce down simultaneously on Boston, New York, and Washington, and carry off the dollars, bricks, and bars—then where is your ridiculous intrinsic?

I do not want any United States greenbacks that read, "The United States will pay." No, sir, I do not want any of them.

But what I do want is a United States greenback that reads: "United States of America. One dollar. This bill is a legal tender for all debts, dues, and demands. Washington, D. C., July 4, 1892."

I make the date July 4, 1892, because I do not see how I can wait any longer than that date.

Of course we want some fives and tens, and since Sam Jones fails to fill his $500 contract with me, we had better hav some fifties and one hundreds.

Then I want some fifty and twenty-five cent fractional currency—the best and most convenient change we ever had. I want it made a felony to disparage this money and piracy or treason to counterfeit it.

Then every one of those bills would stand up and say, I am a dollar, or ten dollars, etc.

And every man, woman, and child in the United States would be loyal enough, and patriotic enough, and hav confidence enough in the stability of the government, to uphold and redeem them in good honest labor, produce of brawn or brain, as long as they are usable.

Then Uncle Sam should call them—the unusable ones—in and say, "Well done, good and faithful, enter into my crematory," and forthwith issue another of the same denomination to take its place to bless and gladden all mankind. L. L. Goodwin.

A Voice From the West Indies.

A MIRACLE AT THE END OF THE CENTURY.

Natural phenomena of a disquieting nature, as earthquakes, storms, conflagrations, etc., hav a tendency to raise in religious souls aspirations of ardent faith caused by these geological or atmospherical disturbances. People do not fail for the least thing to exclaim, miracle! and this with such enthusiasm and extraordinary conviction as nothing can equal.

On the morning of Saturday, 3d July, the inhabitants of the island of Martinique had had such a disagreeable waking from their slumbers that the last oscillations of the ground had not as yet passed away when already in a village of the island a number of inhabitants were making their way to a point of the locality where there is a modest chapel or unpretentious throne with a statue of the Virgin of Seven Sorrows. The virgin, many trustworthy witnesses affirm, during the event of the morning, dreading to receive over her plaster head the walls of the chapel, which would hav added an eighth to her seven sorrows, had disappeared from the very first shock, to reappear at the last oscillation. A pious woman, who had a desire to hear on that day an early mass, had left her house very early that morning and was the only person who had seen the miracle.

A number of people had run to the spot sanctified by the mysterious phenomenon which had just happened, apparition and disapparition without trick or prestidigitator's wand, commented upon the event, and tongues plied freely, when a farce-player amused himself in relating the following miracle which had happened in the same locality some time before, and which made everybody laugh save a few devotees who were scandalized about it, and nobody thought more about the miraculous disapparition of the Virgin of Seven Sorrows, attributing to his narration a sort of identical cause.

Here are the facts as I heard them, without amplification or diminution:

About thirty years ago there lived an old lady who was a great devotee; she woke up before daybreak, went to communion regularly every morning, and was a source of admiration to the whole populace, even the curé of the parish, so firm were her convictions in the exercise of her religious duties.

Married to an honorable man, but somewhat a skeptic, she beheld with pain her husband's rather irreverent discourse and attitude at times concerning religion and sacred things.

This is what happened to her once: One morning returning from an early mass, which is said in the village at dawn, upon entering her apartment she saw an extraordinary vision. A superb plaster saint, with rosy cheeks, gilded, and with blue robes girded about it, and who was venerated under the name of Joseph, had descended from the altar raised to his honor in a conspicuous part of the room and was advancing through the apartment, slowly and somewhat capriciously, without the bottom of the statue seeming to touch the ground. Imagin the good lady's astonishment; she had just made a promis to Mary, and behold her divine spouse, the amiable father of Jesus, leaving heaven, where he must be very happy, to come and manifest himself to one of the faithful adherents of his wife.

Dumb with terror, stupefied with pain, the good lady dared not move; she had fallen upon her knees with folded arms; she contemplated with increasing stupor the irregular movements of the saint. At last a loud cry which the whole house reëchoed loudly escaped from her throat. People ran to the spot, the news was communicated; the good lady's St. Joseph walks; the servants, as astonished as their mistress, hurried themselvs through the stairs; the curate is sent for and he comes to witness the miracle, and on the journey prepares a sermon for the following Sunday on, What time was ever so fertil in miracles?

The curé arrived amidst a multitude of enthusiastic parishioners, who placed themselvs in presence of the marvelous statue, more curious than the good lady and her neighbors. The curè, who has excellent reasons for not having such unshaken faith as that of his clients, witnesses the strange movements of the statue and its tendency to go toward the furniture as if to penetrate under.

Forgetting the severe punishment which befell Dathan and Abiron when they dared to touch the ark of the covenant, the curé laid an impious hand on the statue, which stopped briskly. Encouraged in his impunity he raises the saint. . . . What stupor, what rage, holy indignation! Each could see, clearly attached to the socket of the statue and altogether out of view, a large land turtle called in these islands morocoy, of which cooks make peppered ragouts gratifying to the palate.

The good lady faints away. The curé with a kick sends the body of the miracle rolling to the floor against the furniture. The good lady's husband, who was strongly suspected to hav been the author of this joke, made no appearance at home during the day. E. S.

The Bible.

The time is coming when one of the greatest wonders of the world will be, how such a book as the Bible could ever be palmed off on rational beings, capable of thinking, as the inspiration of a being supreme in power, wisdom, justice, love, and mercy. It is far more like the work of partial, ignorant, unjust, wrathful, hurtful, vindictiv tyrants than a being worthy to be called God.

"With thy money thou mayest buy wine or strong drink or whatsoever thy soul lusteth after." Could the worst libertin, debauchee, or harlot ask for more liberty?

"Wine cheereth the heart of God and man." Here it makes God a wine-bibber.

"With thy money thou mayest buy bondsmen and bondswomen of the heathen round about thee; and if thou beat thy bondsman that he die, nevertheless, if he livs three days after the beating, it is nobody's business, for he is thy money." A beautiful specimen of impartiality, wisdom, love, and kindness to come from a divine source! We hav tried slavery, and it has cost near a million of lives of our most robust men, and many millions of dollars, and filled the country with pensioned cripples, widows, and orphans, and all kinds of vice, and now one-half our working people whom our government of villains hav robbed of their birthright to land are as much slaves as the colored people were before the war.

Recently I hav read the head-lines of every chapter in the Old Testament and three hundred whole chapters, and such another dirty mess of stuff I never found in any other book; and here declare that the Bible has cursed the human race more than any if not all other books ever published. There has hardly ever been a sin or crime committed but what authority for it can be found in the Bible. The Bible has caused millions of the best people of their time to be slain, and even now is dividing the people of this nation into one hundred and forty different sects, causing each sect to hate all the others.

The Bible contains more than one hundred absolute contradictions and abounds in falsehoods.

It says David was a man after God's own heart, which is understood to be a good man, when the fact is exactly the reverse. He was one of the most licentious, bloody old villains that ever cursed his race. He kept a house full of wives and concubines, and when he wanted another he had only to send a man to fetch her. He saw Uriah's wife bathing at a distance, which so fired his unbridled passions that he sent a man to fetch her, and after he had debauched her he wanted to get Uriah out of the way that he might hav her all to himself. He sent Uriah a dish of food, but Uriah probably thought it was poisoned and would not eat it. He then put him in the front of battle to get him killed, and was so anxious to make it a sure thing that he put his soldiers nearer the walls of the city than usual, and thus, in his anxiety to kill Uriah, many others were slain that would not hav been if they had not gone so near the wall to be sure of having Uriah killed. A woman threw a piece of a millstone from the wall and killed a man! So, old David, the man after God's own heart, killed quite a number in securing Uriah's wife.

I counted eight wives that David had before he went to Jerusalem, and the Bible says that after he went there he took more wives and concubines, but does not say how many, but givs the names of thirteen more children that were born to him there. When David got frightened and fled from Absalom, he left ten concubines to keep house. And Absalom got in with them to spite David, which made the treacherous old fellow so mad that he sent the concubines away, never saw them again, for he had enough others, but had them shut up and kept them shut up as long as they lived!

When David was at home he was always cursing his enemies and praying for their destruction, instead of laboring to reform and save them. And then, when he got the least whim against a city or a tribe he would go out with his army and kill several thousand men, and bring home plunder enough to support his harem a dozen years! A man after God's own heart ought to hav children of decent character, but David's children were as licentious as himself. Read Sam. xiii, 11, and see how Amnon, the son of David, treated his sister Tamar at the advice of his cousin, and then tell me if a God would inspire men to write such stuff for young people to read.

This is only a mere sketch of the filthiness of David and his family. And he is called a man after God's own heart. Then there is his son Solomon called the wisest man, while his seven hundred wives and three hundred concubines prove him the greatest fool of all history.

Let us see what kind of food the Bible God givs some of his children. Read Lev. xxvi, 29; Isa. xxxvi, 12.

And for a specimen of the chastity and politeness of the Bible God read Isa. iii, 17. Do not fail to read these passages and then throw your Bible into the fire as the filthiest and most harmful book ever published.

As St. Wanamaker the postmaster has pronounced the Bible a suitable book to pass through the mails, will he please use this article and the scripture it refers to as a lesson in his Sabbath-school and publish the result? J. Hacker.

The Lord's Prayer, Revised Translation.

Our Father who art in heaven, unhallowed be thy name. Thy kingdom come—like Tilden's administration. Thy will be done on earth—not as 'tis in heaven; for there was Satan cradled, and thence St. John beheld the carnage of celestial war, while Job heard God "charge his angels with folly." Giv us this day our daily bread—in proportion as by honest toil, and not by sacred sophistry, we earn it; and forgiv us our transgressions as we forgiv Thee for Thine alleged outrages on mankind. Lead us not into Crusades, but deliver us from Inquisitions; and save us at last in oblivion for Bradlaugh the Reformer's sake.

How to Help The Truth Seeker.

1. When renewing get a friend to subscribe and thus save a half dollar apiece.

2. Get your newsdealer to display it on his stand or in his shop window. Be sure that he displays the pictures.

3. Get your newsdealer to keep in stock one or more copies, with your guarantee to take off his hands at the end of the week any that remain unsold. If he exhibits them the pictures alone will sell them.

4. Take a few extra copies and circulate them among your acquaintances. On your request, we will send you back-number sample copies free.

5. Leave a copy occasionally where it will be picked up—in the train, in the factory, in the meeting-room, in the cigar store, in the barber-shop. Leave it picture-side up.

6. Keep in your pocket some of our cheap tracts, and when convenient hand one to a friend.

7. Get a new subscriber by persuading some friend to take it.

More Fossil Footprints.

From the Springfield Republican.

Several footprints of reptils of various dimensions hav lately been discovered about three miles from Holyoke upon the rock in G. L. Bosworth's quarry near the shore of the Connecticut river which hav caused considerable excitement and elicited many inquiries. These discoveries occur not infrequently, more than twelve thousand such footmarks having already been brought to light, and, in fact, it is well known throughout the scientific world that the new red sandstone of the Connecticut valley, which extends about one hundred and ten miles from north to south and averages about twenty miles in width from east to west, is one of the most prolific depositories of fossil prints. Slabs of this stone, having upon them the wonderful indentations, can be found in almost all the museums of this continent and Europe.

A few days ago, accompanied by my friend, Professor Woodman, who is, as the world knows, one of the most profound scholars in the natural sciences, I visited Mr. Bosworth's quarry. The soil over the rocks, which is not very thick at that locality, had been removed and left exposed an extensiv area, upon which a large number of tracks are apparent. Professor Woodman said that in all his ramblings through the world he had not seen such a large number clustered together in so circumscribed a space. Several of the tracks can be traced from one end of the quarry to the other. There is not only a large number of them, but they are of various sizes, and were made by animals of different species, although the conformation of the foot indicates that they belong to the same genus. Some of the tracks measure eighteen inches in length and ten in width; others are ten inches long, and there are others that do not measure more than three or four inches, and are of proportional width. A slab taken out near the edge of the public road which forms the northern boundary of the quarry, has two large, well-delineated tracks upon its surface four feet six inches apart, which indicate the stride in the step of the animal. All the tracks bear the same conformation of the foot—that is, all hav only three toes, and the steps bear the same characteristics; they are single; that is, made by bipeds. There is no doubt they are much smaller now than when first made. The mud in drying up must hav contracted considerably to become as the rock is to-day—of crystalline texture.

Many of these fossil prints bear a close resemblance to the tracks of birds, so much so that for years many of them were believed to hav been made by some of the feathered tribes, but since the discovery of the dinosaurs in the triassic strata the question has been definitly settled. There is no doubt now that these tracks were made by several species of reptils which hav already been found in the triassic beds of Nevada and California, and on the western slope of the Rocky mountains. The numerous tracks found show that these animals formed a large genus, with very many species. One species had three toes, another had four, and another five. The three-toed was the most numerous and produced species of enormous sizes. The brontozoum giganteum, the otozoum moodii, belong to the three-toed variety and were from fourteen to fifteen feet in hight. The four-toed and five-toed species were not quite so numerous, but they produced individuals of still greater dimensions. Specimens hav been found that measured eighteen feet in hight and twenty-four inches in length.

The fossils of all these animals show that all the species had large heads, saurian-like, with enormous teeth. They had all four legs but made little use of their forelegs, which were very small and atrophied for want of use. These characteristics indicate that they were in form as well as in habits closely allied to the bird family. The fact that they walked on their hindlegs, that their bones were hollow like those of birds, that they had the same conformation of the foot, and were biped in their habits, points to the conclusion that they were the primitiv sketches of a new design which was just in the stage of its evolution, an intermediate form or a connecting link emerging from the reptilian genus into the genus bird. They are surely nearer the type bird than that of any other, and if it were not for their forelegs they might be classed at once as the primitiv genus of the feathered tribe.

The fact that they had teeth does not preclude the possibility of their being intermediate between reptils and birds, because teeth were a very common appendage to the primitiv birds, and are still found with some of our living birds. The parrot and the penguin hav rudiments of teeth and alveolar processes. That conformation in fossil birds was the law and its absence the exception. Several species had jaws like saurians and were saurian-like in their disposition and habits. The archæopteryx, the gastornis, the hesperornis, the ichthyornis, and many others were of that sort. Some of these birds had teeth three inches in length, sharp and pointed.

But the dinosaurs were not the only animals which had the privilege to roam over the muddy plain of this valley. A large number of other footprints hav been found which must hav been made by other animals belonging to different orders. The tracks of the labyrinthodonts, the enaliosaurs, the belodonus lepturus, the dromatherium, and many others are often met with. In 1842 the late Professor Hitchcock had already examined two thousand which had been made by thirty-two species of bipeds and fourteen species of quadrupeds.

In regard to footprints, the question upon which centers the greatest interest is not about their number or nature, nor of the character or disposition of the animals that made them, but in their immense antiquity. If they dated only a few years back they would not be noticed. But their age is so immense that we can never form an adequate conception of its duration, and it is so with all geological periods. The number of centuries required to bring the state of the earth from a vaporous mass into its concrete form, and then through the series of transformations which hav marked the evolutions of the radiates into the articulates, and these into the mollusks, and the mollusks into the fishes, and the fishes into the reptils, and the reptils into the birds, and the birds into mammalians, and the mammalians into the genus homo, baffle our imagination. The only means we hav to unravel the past is the division of time adopted for geology, that is the azoic, or time previous to the appearance of the organic life; the eozoic, or the time when life first appeared; the paleozoic, or age of fishes; the mesozoic, or age of reptils; the cenozoic, or the age of the mammalians. The evolution of a class of animals into other classes and species is called an age; the group of rocks laid during an age is an era, and each rock of an era is called a period; thus we say, the paleozoic is the age of fishes, and comprises the Devonian era, which is composed of the "Portage," Hamilton, corniferous, and the Oriskany periods. The chronology of a rock is determined by its fossils if it is sedimentary, and by its chemical or physical composition and arrangement if it is plutonic. These minor points are indispensable for the intelligent study of the science and to enable one to grasp its intrinsic problems.

A Doubter's Reply.

I useter go to meetin' some to hear the wimmin sing,
An' see ole Parson Soanso go howlin' round the ring;
'Twas high old times they useter hav a-prayin' an' a-shoutin',
While I sot there an' looked around a-thinkin' an' a-doubtin'.

"Come on to glory! Now's the day! Don't put it off no longer;
The win's of love is blowin' now, God's grace is gittin' stronger."
Thus raved the parson as he howled an' long an' louder shouted,
But I sot there an' shuck my head an' sorter smiled an' doubted.

"Is there a soul in here to-night," the parson yelled with vigor,
"That hasn't felt the spirit's might nor yielded to its rigor?
Is there a man or woman here who will not go to glory?
Git up before me if you dare an' let me hear your story."

I sot there quiet, didn't stir, although I felt I orter
Rise up in the meetin' an' do up that godly snorter.
"Young man," he yelled, "you are condemned to endless death in hades.
Will you go down to hell from here amongst these weepin' ladies?"

I looked the parson in the eye, I felt my nerves grow stronger,
I couldn't stand his wicked look, no, not a minit longer;
I sprung right up an' raised my hand an' said above the bustle,
"If you can git me on my knees, ole fellow, you must hustle.

"I'm not afraid to liv nor die; your God to me's a stranger;
He never helped me hoe my corn nor guarded me in danger,
He never comes to help the weak when strugglin' with priva'ion,
He's always on the strongest side in ev'ry land an' nation.

"Last year poor neighbor Jones was sick, he's one of your own members;
His fire of zeal's a mighty blaze when your'n is coolin' embers.
He leads in meetin' an' he sings, he's one of the anointed,
If Jones gits left I swar the rest of you'll be disappointed.

"But when his crop was in the grass you didn't try to aid him,
You hoed your corn an' left him thar just whar disease had laid him.
Your elders an' your sisters here forgot that Jones was ailin',
They're mighty good to pray an' sing but love is not their failin'.

"I hitched my old gray mare an' plowed your brother Jones's cotton
An' dug his 'taters that was neigh to sproutin' an' to rottin',
I fed his stock an' went to mill an' 'tended to his taxes.
Jones is sittin' over there an' knows that these the facts is.

"Now what's the use to hav a God if he can't ease your labors,
If he can't put it in your hearts to help your sickly neighbors?
Why do you pray to one you say 's a kind an' loving father?
Don't you suppose he knows your needs without your endless bother?

"An' what's the use of singin' sarms an' shoutin' to Jehovah?
Did prayer ever plow your corn or singin' cut your clover?
Did preachin' ever feed the poor or edicate your chillun?
If you will point out such a case I'll come up more'n willin'."

But nary elder said a word, the sisters quit their singin',
Ole Parson Soanso sot down, his tremblin' hands a-wringin',
An' as the meetin' was broke up with nary sinner shoutin'
I left an' walked across the fields a-doubtin' an' a-doubtin'.

Jerusalem Toucan (Toucana Jerusalema).

The Jerusalem toucan is not a song-bird. A desire for money has taken all the tune out of his temples. He is never found in the forests or in the fields. Like the canary, he is to be seen only about the house. He sometimes prays—for more money. He is a bird of prey. He livs on lambs. Once there was a Jerusalem toucan that called himself the "lamb of God." But he did not liv long after these words were spoken, for his fellow-toucans, always hungry for lamb, crucified him at once, or rather as soon as the law allowed.

Explanatory.

It was a church and steeple that the spirit of Henry Ward Beecher drew in Dr. Hansmann's notebook; and on the tall spire there was a cross. It is therefore supposable that Mr. Beecher meant to say that the Catholic church was "the curse of creation." There was no steeple on Plymouth church, much less a cross.

Lectures and Meetings.

S. P. Putnam's lecture appointments for September and October are as follows: Crookston, Minn., September 1, 2, 3; Jamestown, N. D., 5, 6; Boseman, Mont., 8, 9; Colville, Wash., 12, 13; Spangle, Wash., 15; Rosalia, Wash., 16, 17; Oakesdale, Wash., 18; Palouse City, Wash., 19, 20; Pasco, Wash., 22, 23; Nanaimo, B. C., 26; Wellington, B. C., 27, 28; Snohomish, Wash., 30; Portland convention, October 3, 4, 5; Grant's Pass, 7, 8; San Francisco, 11. Will lecture in California through the months of October, November, December, and January, state convention January 29.

John R. Charlesworth will commence his lecture trip September 6th, at Pittsburgh, Pa. His lecture appointments for the present are as follows: September 6, Pittsburgh, Pa.; 10, Millersburg, O.; 12, 13, Shreve, O.; 14, 15, Nashville, O.; 20, Alliance, O.; 21, 22, Quincy, O; 23, North Baltimore, O.; October 6, Chicago, Ill.; 7, 8, 9, Havana, Ill.; 11, Des Moines, Ia. It is his intention to visit the Pacific coast, if possible, having received several pressing invitations to lecture there, especially in California and Oregon. Friends in Nebraska, Colorado, Utah, and other places along the route desiring his services to lecture are requested to address him in care of R. G. Smith, Alliance, O., until further notice.

J. G. Heetwig, P. O. Box 413, Washington, D. C., intends to lecture during the forthcoming fall and winter on the following subjects: 1. "National Taxation," opposing the present customs and internal revenue systems of the United States and advocating a not graduated income tax in their stead, for raising the revenue necessary for the support of the government. 2. "Free Coinage," advocating free and unlimited coinage, from American silver, of a temporary silver dollar, correct as to its bullion value, and, as soon as it can be accomplished, an international agreement as to a fixed ratio between gold and silver as monetary metals. 3. "Sunday Laws," energetically opposing such laws, and, in addition, expounding the other demands of Liberalism. He urgently and sincerely solicits engagements for these lectures.

We are convinced that it is contrary to all moral ideas to teach that the guilty may be pardoned because the innocent hav suffered. The idea of the sacrifice of life, whether of brute or man, for "the salvation of souls," is a wicked and hurtful notion. It has led to countless atrocities, and still works evil, leading the Pocasset Christian to strike his knife to the heart of his little girl, and probably influencing the assassin of the president in his wicked deed. Jesus was put to death by the Jews on the charge of sedition and blasphemy. He tried to avoid it, but was betrayed by Judas. How this can be made an offering by God of his son for the sins of the world is past comprehension. We hav no fear that men will be worse if they lose the restraint of the idea that God, in all ages, has demanded the blood of the innocent as the condition of forgivness of the guilty.—Robert C. Adams.

The Single-Tax Question.

Mr. Rousseau still continues to write under the heading, "Homeless for a Week," apparently oblivious of the fact that Mr. Billings has long ago been provided for, and is now living in such luxury on his "pitiful pittance of $8 per week"—which is more than any farmer in Kansas is making by his labor, and more than any man without capital can make on free raw land anywhere—that he doubtless has himself almost forgotten the incident entirely.

I was in hopes that Mr. Rousseau would giv us some good reason for believing in the single-tax theory; for I am very anxious to hear of some "aperient resolvant" which will prove an efficacious remedy for the ills that the body politic is heir to. I remember that once in Illinois, when riding on horseback to town, I was stopped by a man sitting by the roadside, who hailed me with the words: "I say, sir, do you know of anyone who wants any kyarpenter work done? I am no hatchet-and-saw man; I am a kyarpenter. I served an apprenticeship of seven years in Brooklyn." Not long ago I began a newspaper discussion on the single tax with a bank cashier and political aspirant; but, like the "ornery" dog" which fought the widow's fifteen-pound cat, he "kicked and flummixed and died" in the second round. I expect better things from Mr. Rousseau. Being a resident of Brooklyn, it may be safely affirmed that he is no hatchet-and-saw man, but a regular "kyarpenter," who can construct a stately edifice, imposing to the eye and invulnerable to Kansas missils, out of single-tax materials alone. Being a truth seeker and truth lover, however, I must confess that the phrase, Vae quantum nihil, is barely repressible when I look over his page-and-a-half reply to my short article. It is true, he has constructed an edifice, but it is only a chateau en Espagne, and the gaps in his fence are too numerous to be stopped by a castle in the air with no better foundation than a "midsummer night's dream."

Mr. Rousseau, in his first article, gave an account of the peregrinations of a certain Mr. Billings, who, for unassigned and presumably unassignable reasons, left his employment in New Jersey, and, without a penny in his pocket, wandered into the "realms of the unknown" city of New York in search of work. As a natural consequence of his penniless condition, he was obliged to beg or starve until he obtained employment, which he did on the second or third day of his arrival in the metropolis, at $8 per week. Mr. Rousseau affirmed that the $8 per week was but a "pitiful pittance," and that if the single-tax scheme had been in operation and "natural opportunities" open, Mr. Billings could hav gone to market-gardening or employed his time in stone quarrying. In reply I wanted to know how Mr. Billings was going to build his fences, plow his land, build and furnish his house, and buy his seed without a penny in his pocket. You should remember, Mr. Rousseau, that the laborer cannot liv in your air castle while he is market-gardening. I want to know whether these "natural opportunities" which the single taxer sighs for, include houses already built and furnished by other people. I would also like to know of what value a rock quarry would be to a penniless laborer who has no money to pay the rent-tax on it and therefore cannot gain access to it. Under the single-tax scheme, none but the rich would buy the stone after it was quarried, for they alone could afford to pay the tax on land long enough to make improvements remunerativ. Mr. Rousseau has not answered these objections. He should take the overshot wheel out of his machinery before replying again.

In my former letter I said that if the tax was all put upon land "those who were able to assert and maintain their rights would get and keep all of the land to the exclusion of others." Mr. Rousseau mistakes the meaning of this sentence altogether when he imagins that a conspiracy on the part of capital would be necessary in order to carry it out. It is evident that whenever men are allowed to hold all the land which they are able and willing to pay the taxes on, men who, like Billings, hav nothing to pay taxes with will not hold any land. Those who hav the money will pay the taxes and will hold the land. Those who hav no money will take their choice, "Work or starve, damn you."

Mr. Rousseau says, "What is necessary is this: take the value of the land and apply it for the use of the community." In other words, make those who own the land pay yearly all that the use of the land is worth, and use the money in keeping the laborer above the necessity of work. This scheme would, no doubt, prove very gratifying to the laborer—that is, if he has no conscience—but it would not hurt the landlord. He could easily import laborers to till his farms. The government might, of course, counteract and destroy the inclination of immigrants to rent or hire out by offering each one the respectable position of a man of leisure, fed and supported at government expense; but that would almost depopulate Europe, and cause a speedy downfall of this government. Besides, it would mean simply confiscation, which is the same as repudiation of titles, and would present to the world the most gigantic spectacle of moral turpitude ever witnessed. Confiscation might be accomplished by a method much cheaper than that of gorging the treasury with a corruption fund in order to keep loafers and dead-beats in comfortable idleness, and thousands of additional tax-collectors, treasure-guardians, and food and clothing dispensers employed at good salaries. If you mean confiscation, why not adopt some cheap and easy method? If you do not mean confiscation, you do not mean anything but to throw an additional burden upon labor. It is a favorit postulate of the single taxers that labor pays all the taxes; and yet they propose to benefit labor by raising the taxes to the highest limit. They forget their own premises, and argue as though capital could be compelled to pay taxes. The only way you can compel capital to pay more than its share of taxes is by confiscation; and if that is what you want, say so, and let us at once proceed to inquire whether justice in this land demands that all title-deeds, bought and paid for, and guaranteed by the whole people, shall be repudiated and their value stolen.

Right across the road from where I sit writing livs an old man, who, with his wife, occupies a home on a forty-acre farm which they hav bought and paid for with money which they hav earned by hard labor. They are now too old to work much, and hav nothing to liv on except the rent of their farm. The single-tax scheme would take from them every penny of their present living, while giving them nothing in return. It would act just as a brigand would do, and I want to know if such a law would not hav brigands for its supporters. There are still about five hundred millions of acres of vacant public land which can be had for nothing. Why do not those who want land take a homestead? Will the single tax make these lands worth any less than nothing?

I talked with a single-tax advocate recently. This man refused to teach a school last winter in the country because the district would only giv him $40 per month. He wants to get a farm. I asked him why he did not go West and take up a claim. He replied that he did not want to go outside the pale of civilization. No, but he wants to steal the improved and now valuable farms which old settlers now own, but which they once went outside of civilization to get, and suffered innumerable hardships in order to keep until they should become valuable.

Mr. Rousseau says the large ranches in California are all being divided up into small farms. Then California does not need the single tax. Increase of taxes does not necessarily compel the speculator to sell his land; it only compels him to put it to use. But, as the single tax is rated according to land values, vacant land now open to homesteaders or held by speculators would be taxed no higher than at present until civilization had grown up to it. The burden would be on valuable farms, and those who tilled them would be compelled to either pay the tax in addition to the rent or else go to the uncivilized and uncultivated waste. The ranches in California were sold doubtless because the cattle and sheep business did not pay as well as formerly owing to low prices of products and increased value of land. This law naturally operates without legislativ interference, although free hides and low tariff on wool may hav had something to do with it.

Mr. Rousseau says that under the operation of the single tax "the only aim of the landholder will then be to make what he has produce all it possibly can." I do not see why. The aim of Henry George in advocating the single tax, as told by himself, is to ultimately cause the tax to absorb the land value, and why should a man improve his farm or try to make it more productiv when the rent is sure to absorb all the extra profits? I might answer Mr. Rousseau in his own words: "No sane man would spend the capital or labor necessary to cultivate a farm, if when he had improved it and was ready to gather his crops any wandering Tom, Dick, or Harry [or all of the Toms, Dicks, and Harrys together] could come up to him and say, I hav the same right to this farm that you hav, it being as much mine as yours. I propose to hav half it produces."

Mr. Rousseau says: "Mr. Darrow seems to hold the general opinion that men do not need land, but only the results of labor." And then he mentions "McKeever's hog," which wanted only acorns, not oak trees. I hav known a great many men to liv quite comfortably without owning a foot of land. The principal of our city school receives $100 per month and livs in a rented house. When in the real estate business I once tried to sell some land to a man who said he did not want to buy, for he had "too damned much land now." If all men who do not own land are hogs, must the others therefore resign their titles to them?

Mr. Rousseau says that bare land allied with bare labor is a strong combination. Well, it may be so, but if the two were sufficient of themselvs the farmers of Kansas, Iowa, and Nebraska would not now be so deeply in debt for money borrowed for improvement purposes. If land, not money, is the desideratum, why will families mortgage their homes to obtain money? Labor parts with its all to get a loan and then curses the money-loaner for his accommodation. The loaner, to be sure, expects good pay for the use of his money; but if it was no accommodation to the farmer to get it not a dollar would be loaned. Mr. Billings would hav passed by ten thousand acres of free and unused land to get the "opportunity" of a job at $8 per week. It is often true that labor does not get its share of wealth, and it seems by the number of manufacturers and merchants going into insolvency that some of them are not getting their share. Rich men oftener commit suicide in proportion to numbers than poor men. That proves nothing.

If Mr. Rousseau will read Lee Merriweather's "Tramp Trip Through Europe," he will find plenty of confirmation of my statement in regard to farm wages in Switzerland. He says the laboring mechanics on music-box making, after serving an apprenticeship of ten or twelve years in Switzerland, receive as high as $1 per day, which their employer regarded as a munificent sum. "An average of $1 a day for the nicest, the most delicate mechanical work known." Near the line between Switzerland and Italy he saw "the women harnessed to wagons like mules or oxen, and drawing great loads of hay that in New York Bergh would not allow a horse to draw" (p. 103).

In Italy he found skillful weavers getting twenty-seven cents per day. In Belgium, "skilled paper-makers, iron-workers, woolen-weavers, etc., will not average more than fifty to sixty-five cents a day" (p. 247). He found boys and girls of twelve years earning in Germany only from nine to eighteen cents per week. Mr. Rousseau utters a truth when he says, "You can no longer satisfy the laboring men by telling them they are better paid than their fellow-toilers of other countries;" but his remark does not apply to all. It applies, doubtless, with much force, to those discontented miners at Connellsville who purchased so many guns, ammunition, and whisky to enable them to fight the police when their families needed the money; and it applies to a certain union in Chicago which claims to hav $1,000,000 laid up ready to go on a strike. It seems to me that $1,000,000 would be amply sufficient to enable them to start a coöperativ industry of their own, and, with their skilled workmen, they could easily do much better than to wage war against capital. I do not blame the laborers for combining together and for doing whatever they can legally and morally do to obtain just remuneration for their services; but a man who has money to buy whisky and guns to help him to fight his employer, and uses his money for that purpose when his family is starving, shows very plainly that he is not fit to hav a family, that he is too cowardly to fight when sober, and that he is unfit to take care of his own interests, much less to cast a ballot intelligently.

The labor population is the bone and sinew of the country, and as a rule, more virtuous and honest than the so-called "upper classes." They hav less time to study political economy, and are more liable to be led astray by political patent nostrum vendors. It was in New York city, crowded with foreigners uneducated in the principles of freedom, that Henry George received sixty thousand votes for mayor. Those laborers who hav enjoyed many years' residence in this country are generally as well qualified to perform the functions of citizenship as are the most favored classes in the land. Why? Because they enjoy educational privileges here such as are not within the reach of their fellow-toilers in other countries.

"If, then, you require man to beg or buy land, you require him to beg or buy the privilege of working—that is to say, of living. This makes him a slave just as much as though he was sold on the auction-block to the highest bidder" (Edwards Rousseau).

Did not every farmer and other land-owner who owns the land on which he livs hav to buy or beg the land which he cultivates? Is every landlord, therefore, a slave? Is not this a very easy reductio ad absurdum? Single taxers talk of landlords as though the latter had stolen the land which they own. Was not nearly all of the land originally owned by the whole people conjointly? and did they not sell it for all they could get? What right hav they now to take the land back without paying for it? "What is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander." If the people as a whole could receive money for the land, each individual who owns land, and has a quit-claim deed from the whole people, certainly ought to possess the same right. Falsis in uno, falsus in omnibus. If the individual has no right to sell, and should not be paid for his title, what right had the people to take his money for the land?

I imagin that the reason why there are not flax and linen factories in Kansas is that too many of the materials out of which linen, rope, twine, etc., are made are admitted free of duty, and America laborers prefer to work in some protected industry for good wages rather than to raise flax, and therefore all the manufactories are located on the seaboard, convenient to the importer of these raw materials. Sites for factories can be purchased in Kansas as cheaply as in any other country in the world (for nearer $800 than $8,000), according to its value for the purpose; but so long as sisal, manilla, and jute are admitted free, no one is willing to pay a higher price for goods made of flax, and as raw flax pays a duty, it cannot be imported and worked in competition with these other materials; so we buy most of our linen from foreigners and raise no flax. If the farmers of Kansas could dispose of the straw at good figures, flax, being a crop that is not so much affected by drouth as corn and wheat, would soon become a profitable crop in Kansas, and the farmers would get better prices for their wheat. They could pay off their mortgages with a good paying crop that never fails, and do so without crowding the wheat and corn growers of other states to the wall.

We need more factories, more money, and less usury; but we need five-wheeled wagons worse than we need the single tax. A. H. DARROW.

To Cure Consumption.

[Dr. James Barnsfather, a resident of Cincinnati, and one of our oldest subscribers, has discovered what he thinks to be a cure for consumption. The Times-Star of that city has interviewed him, and this is what the doctor claims:]

I am very hopeful. I hav been working for over five years at this remedy, although I never said a word about it till 1890, when I was suffering from a severe attack of la grippe. I did not expect to recover, and therefore I had published the tale of a few of my experiences with bacilli. My statements were very brief and unsatisfactory, but they contained the essence of my principal experiments at the time, and I hoped that some younger bacteriologists would take up my investigations where I had left them, after getting the cue from my announcement. But, so far, I hav not seen any articles on the subject.

I made this discovery accidentally, as I made two others. About five and a half years ago I was suffering with acute rheumatism, and making an investigation of my case I discovered the bacillus of rheumatism. But at the same time I had a very dear friend who was suffering from phthisis and whose father, sister, and brother had all died from the same disease. This lady friend of mine was so badly afflicted that the physicians said that she could not liv more than a year longer. Her lungs were examined by another physician than myself, and he found that she had consolidation of the right lung, a bad sputa, etc. Accidentally I inoculated her with the materis morbi, i.e., the germ of rheumatism. She was attacked by acute rheumatism, for I had not measured the amount of the inoculating material, but she began to show signs of improvement in her case of phthisis. She finally recovered from it altogether, as well as from her rheumatism, and she is to-day a well woman with no cough or sputa, and weighs over two hundred pounds. Here the idea struck me that we hav without doubt the antagonistic action of the rheumatic bacillus against the bacillus of phthisis pulmonalis, or tuberculosis. I was in Europe all last winter making arrangements for experiments which are now going on, and which, I hope, will prove the truth of my discovery. I made no experiments or observations myself beyond watching the one case of which I told you, but I saw a great many eminent physicians about the antagonism of the two species of germs, and these physicians stated emphatically that they had never found the rheumatic diathesis, or, as we ordinarily say, rheumatism, in combination with the phthisical condition in the same patient. Consequently I feel encouraged to bring this investigation before the public.

Now, then, what is my method? Just as Jenner took the vaccine of a cow and inoculated human beings to prevent small-pox, I take the rheumatic germs from the diseased joint of a person afflicted with rheumatism and inject them into a tuberculous patient by means of a hypodermic syringe inserted into the back between the two shoulder-blades. That's all. In my researches in microscopy, which has been my favorit field of medical science for the past twenty years, I found that the rheumatic bacillus is stronger than the bacillus of consumption and also that the one is antagonistic to the other. Whereon and wherever they are thrown together they try to destroy each other. There is a veritable struggle for existence, and the rheumatic bacillus always conquers. As soon as the consumption germs are destroyed the patient is given tonics and his lungs built up again. If the lung is consolidated, as in the case aforementioned, all the foreign matter which fills it is thrown out and the lung resumes its normal work. Even if a cavity has been formed in the lungs a cicatrix or scar is formed over the cavity and the lung resumes its function. How far this healing may go I cannot tell till I hav heard the result of the experiments that are being conducted for me. Another result of these experiments will be a correct knowledge of the amount of the materis morbi of rheumatism that should be injected in each case, although it does not make any serious difference, as I can cure an acute case of rheumatism in a week.

I hope to go to Edinburgh, Scotland, next fall and hear the result of the trial of my discovery in the royal infirmary there. The head of the staff of the tuberculous department of that great hospital is supervising the work and I shall stand or fall by what he says.

Bacilli are undoubtedly the cause of consumption. I discovered the tuberculosis bacilli eight years before Koch did. His discovery, so called, dates from 1882, and if anyone looks in the files of the Cincinnati Medical News for 1888 he will find that the editor of that journal there acknowledges that in June, 1875, I brought him evidences of my researches on the subject to prove that I discovered the bacillus of scarlet fever. He refused to publish it for fear of being laughed at. I, in the same year, discovered the bacillus tuberculosis but did not try to publish the fact because of discouragements. I discovered it in this way. A doctor who had his office near mine, in this city, brought me a bottle of sputa from a patient who was dying from tuberculosis. He had been much interested in some of my other microscopical researches, and he thought he would bring over this sputa for investigation. In a day or two afterward he called at my office to know if there was anything in it and I jocularly remarked: "There's millions in it." Little did I think at the time that the day would come when these microphytes would be recognized as the chief factors in the process of disease and decay.

I do not place any reliance on Dr. Koch's method, nor on Dr. Max Schuler's, which has just been published.

Promoting Christianity Among the Jews.

The London society for this object has just issued its annual report and claims to hav made ten converts in its "operativ department." Of these, the report says, one remained four months and then went home; another refused to work and was dismissed; a third was tempted back by a rabbi; the fourth and fifth disappeared just before the time appointed for the baptism; the sixth was dismissed for misconduct; and of the others, "while it is too soon to speak, their youth encourages hope that they will do well, and one of them bids fair to become a compositor." Truly the subscribers to this society hav a large share of that faith which is "the hope of things unseen."—Secular Thought.

(Retold for The Truth Seeker by E. B. F., Jr.)

Ten little Hebrews in Christian fat a-fryin',
One slipped the platter and then there were but nine.

Nine little Hebrews at work early and late,
One was bounced for striking and then there were eight.

Eight little Hebrews on the straight road to heaven,
A rabbi kidnapped one and then there were seven.

Seven little Hebrews learning Christian tricks,
One shied at baptism and then there were six.

Six little Hebrews make ready for the dive,
One got hydrophobic and then there were five.

Five little Hebrews find their studies a bore,
The teacher sat on tacks and then there were four.

Four little Hebrews with undeveloped brain,
Too young to get away, must awhile remain.

They'll hav to stay until they can go alone
And follow their brothers, and then there will be none.

But since into such funds dupes their riches pour,
Soon these Jew-baiters will hav ten Hebrews more.

The Troubles of the Church of England.

From the Monthly Packet.

He had been an energetic curate from 1870 to 1880, filled to the brim with all the schemes and methods of his time. He was now, in 1900, an energetic rector whose principal thought, day and night, was for his parish and the church he served. By his side sat his curate, a young man with a puzzled and hunted expression of countenance, and on the opposit side of the room another young man, the organist, sat before a small harmonium, turning over a heap of music. The three appeared to be discussing a harvest thanksgiving for the following week.

"We begin at the Lord's Prayer, of course," said the rector, "then 'Venite' one Psalm—I think it had better be Psalm cxvii, a lesson (and, Smith, I shall only read two verses), the Te Deum, a hymn, the creed harmonized, an anthem, one collect, and a hymn. Will you make a note of it, Brown?"

"You will not introduce a sermon?" asked the curate.

"Better not," said the rector. "Don't you remember what a fuss they made when you preached on Good Friday?"

"It was not more than five minutes," said the curate, meekly.

"But," said the rector, "they said it was the thin edge of the wedge, and that it took all the brightness out of the service, and you know it is of the last importance to get the young men to church."

"There was a young man at church last Sabbath," said the organist hopefully.

"It was Gubbens, and he yawned," said the curate.

"Yawned!" said the horror-stricken rector, "that must not occur again. We must leave out the collect or something. What can we do to amuse him? He must be amused. Brown, can you suggest anything?"

"I did stand on my head on the organ stool at the lesson," said the organist, rather aggrieved, "but some didn't notice me, and some of them said they had seen it better done. I can't think of anything else at the moment."

"You are always kind," said the rector warmly, "and you know how difficult it is to keep up the interest. When I was a curate the banjo was one great means of gaining influence in the parish, but now even the infant school refuses to listen to it."

"Still, a few men used to come occasionally," said the organist; "Robinson, for instance."

"I'm afraid Robinson isn't as steady as he was," said the rector. "He is not as regular at billiards and the bi-weekly dances as he used to be."

The three good men looked at one another, wearied and cast down.

"I spoke to him about it," said the curate, "and he explained that billiards and dancing were too stale; but that he would join a balloon club if we started one."

"Yes," said the rector, "I wish we could, but balloons are so frightfully expensiv, and the duchess won't help, because she says she had to giv £100 to the choir excursion to the West Indies, and she was perfectly certain they were not satisfied; because they heard Parkinson took his choir to Khiva!"

"It was the society for sending everybody to Hamburg for a fortnight that spoilt our choir treats," said the organist. "Before the S. E. H. F. they were quite contented with Bologna for a day or two."

"And you must remember," said the curate, "that the duke was not encored when he sang a comic song in character at the 'Half-hourly amusement club.'"

"Well," interposed the organist, "he could hardly expect it; for since the 'two-penny ticket society' was set on foot, not even a breakdown has a chance in the country."

"I wish," said the rector, reflectivly, "we could get up enough for a set of these automatic choristers; for since we introduced whist in the vestry before Evensong on Saints' days it is so difficult to get the men into the choir."

"Everything is difficult nowadays," remarked the curate. "The committees on the 'free clothing guild' complain that women will not wear a dress which is not imported from Paris!"

"And," continued the rector, "there was a row at the 'free board' to-day, because you had put clear turtle on the menu two days running."

"And the 'guild of amusement' committee told me," said the organist, gloomily, "that, unless it was on pain of death, the members wouldn't see another magic lantern; they were so sick of them."

"Then," said the rector, despairingly, "I do not see how Bible truths are to be brought home to them. If they will not be taught dramatically, or operatically, or by the oxy-hydrogen light, I don't see what is to become of the Church of England. Moreover, if this 'free recreation and gratis summer tour' act passes, I don't know how we are to stand out against the secularists!"

The Silver Question.

Freethinkers, as to their pockets and souls, because, as a matter of course, they all want to be honest men, are in my humble opinion at least as much interested in sound money as anybody else in the country. For this reason the discussion of the silver question in THE TRUTH SEEKER seems to be quite proper.

I just received a short note from the Hon. Joseph H. Walker, member of Congress from Massachusetts (re-elected), who during the Fifty-first Congress was one of the most activ members of the House Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures. He writes:

August 13, 1891.

Dear Sir: Please accept my thanks for THE TRUTH SEEKER of July 25, 1891, with your article in it, "A Correct Silver Dollar."

In this year of our Lord 1891, silver cannot be used as any other than "token" money, except by international agreement. Very truly yours, J. H. WALKER.

This view fully coincides with my own, contained in my article referred to.

Mr. Walker opposes free and unlimited coinage of a silver dollar depreciated as to its bullion value. He, doubtless, also opposes fiat money, that is, a paper currency irredeemable by gold or silver.

Venice, in her day, was a grand and glorious republic, particularly as to commercial affairs and monetary matters.

Yet, if I am not mistaken, that was the case before the discovery of America by Christopher Columbus, or, at all events, before the adoption of the Declaration of Independence and of the Constitution of the United States. J. G. HERTWIG.

The Holy Coat at Treves.

John xix, 23, 24, describes the distribution of Christ's garments after the crucifixion in these words:

"Then the soldiers, when they had crucified Jesus, took his garments, and made four parts, to every soldier a part; and also his coat: Now the coat was without seam, woven from the top throughout. They said therefore among themselvs, Let us not rend it, but cast lots for it whose it shall be: that the scripture might be fulfilled which saith, They parted my raiment among them and for my vesture they did cast lots. These things therefore the soldiers did."

The coat here referred to is now on exhibition at Treves, or Trier, Germany—that is, the church alleges so. It was exposed to view one day last week with great pomp and circumstance. "Two Knights of Malta, in full costume, with drawn swords in their hands, stood on either side of the shrine inclosing the holy coat-case, which was surrounded by tall lighted candles in handsome candlesticks and surmounted by a large gold cross. There was an impressiv scene in the sanctuary during the celebration of high mass, over a hundred priests assisting in the ceremonies. The service, with the monotonous Gregorian chants and the administration of the eucharist to representativ ecclesiastics, seemed of the character of a medieval ceremony. The unveiling of the relic evidently made a deeply devotional impression on the crowd of worshipers. Many were overpowered by their feelings. Several women fainted. There was a general movement of the crowd, prompted by curiosity as well as religious fervor. The procession past the shrine of the pilgrims, most of whom handed a rosary crucifix to attendant priests for contact with the relic, was accompanied by a low hum of paternosters and aves. Among the pilgrims are cripples and sufferers from almost every complaint." The city is overflowing with pilgrims. Twenty excursions a day are running into Treves, and the maimed and the halt expect to be cured by looking at the garment.

But what is most surprising is the serious treatment by the papers of the exhibition of the imposture. The story of the coat is that it, like the "true cross," was one of the numerous relics discovered by or rather for St. Helena, the innkeeper's daughter, who became the wife of one Cæsar and the mother of another. On her return from Palestine, early in the fourth century, she deposited the garment in the basilica out of which grew the cathedral of Treves, a city which in those days was the capital of Belgic Gaul, and the residence of the later Roman emperors.

This city of Treves, as an English writer recalls to mind, has the distinction of being the first place where Christians were put to death by their fellow-Christians, it being here that Priscillian, bishop of Avila, and his chief followers were put to death. It was here too that Constantine increased his popularity and displayed the character of his religion by having a few thousand ill-starred Franks, who had the bad luck to fall captiv into his hands, torn in pieces for the diversion of the citizens.

Historically the coat is first known to hav been used at the consecration of Archbishop Bruno, October 23, 1121. It does not appear to hav been brought out again till 1512, when it was presented for worship and indulgences granted to its pilgrims and worshipers. This was one of the events which precipitated the Reformation. Luther, in no kid-gloved manner, refers to the matter as a shameful and ridiculous farce. During the Reformation it was frequently on view for the comfort and support of the faithful. It was ordered by Leo X. to be shown every seven years and absolution was granted to all pilgrims visiting it. The Reformation and the ensuing wars prevented this order being carried out. It was exhibited in 1531, 1545, 1553, 1583, and 1594. Then it was kept concealed until after the Thirty Years' War and exhibited in 1655. In 1794 it was taken away by the sacrilegious French Republicans, but returned by the Emperor Napoleon, when it was shown to a quarter of a million pilgrims. Since then it has only been shown once, from August 18th to October 6th, 1844.

The coat, like the pictures of the crucifixion or of the "stations of the cross," is used to symbolize the sufferings of Christ, his agony and bloody sweat, and by meditations on these agreeable topics to stimulate religious fervor. The official proclamation declared that "the believing sight of this preëminently sacred relic, with which stand connected in a manner so immediate and impressiv the associations with the whole life and sufferings of the savior, must at once cause many overpowering thoughts and feelings to be awakened in the soul, so that one must feel himself involuntarily torn asunder by them, and believe that he is placed in the immediate presence of the body of our Lord."

In the pastoral letter announcing the exhibition of the coat the bishop of Treves guarantees the genuinness of the garment, and the papers print his letter without comment, as though it were not the most ridiculous thing in the world. Besides the bishop's guarantee a committee of "Orthodox Experts" recently made a private examination of the garment and vouch for its genuinness, "though it is rather moldier and more mildewed than when last permitted to see the light of day." The London Standard, printing this, comments: "That is to say, they vouch that the coat is the same one which was exhibited in 1844, the seals still being intact. We need hardly observe that it is impossible for them, or for anybody else, to produce a scintilla of proof that it is the seamless coat for which the Roman soldiers cast lots on Calvary nearly nineteen centuries ago. Roman Catholic tradition affirms that the coat possesses a miraculous power, enabling it to defy the ravages of time. Unfortunately, however, the pious citizens who hav been requested to examin it do not bear out this explanation by their report. On the contrary, they declare that the garment shows traces of having been renewed, several patches on it being imbedded in a piece of linen or cotton cloth of a later manufacture. In other words, the only conclusion which people more logical than the chapter of Treves must come to is that the traditions of the church of Treves lack that continuity and those collateral proofs which will alone satisfy the modern historian. In short, the entire corpus of evidence adduced by Dr. Willems, secretary of the bishops, in his recent work on the holy coat requires so many assumptions and such extensiv acceptance of witnesses whose trustworthiness must be taken on credit that we are reminded of the famous note of Gibbon in reference to a question calling for an equal amount of faith. Abulfargius vouches for Abulfeda, but who will vouch for Abulfargius?"

The relic is, of course, a fraud, used by the church to gather shekels and maintain her power over the superstitious. It is by no means certain that there ever was a Christ to possess a coat, and if he did exist, it is the world to a grain of sand that any coat he might hav worn would be annihilated by this time. In fact, the Catholics themselvs do not all believe in the relic. When it was exhibited in 1844 John Ronge, a Roman Catholic priest, made a vigorous attack on Bishop Arnoldi for encouraging those acts of adoration to what he declared was at best a relic of the most doubtful authenticity. As this declaration was against a canon of the church and in contempt of more than one papal bull, the recalcitrant churchman was promptly excommunicated by the chapter of Breslau. The result, however, was a schism so wide that in six months there were twenty-seven congregations who professed themselvs of Ronge's way of thinking.

The Christian world, however, never gets wiser when it finds profit in being foolish, and the "holy coat" is a more profitable show than a circus. So the people flock to see it, and the correspondents write about it as though it were a real relic of some real "divinity," instead of being a crude and insignificant fraud.

Where are the Prayers?

Some years ago, when the prince of Wales was prostrated with fever, the pious people of England, especially those of the Established church, repeated prayers for his recovery. They did not do this quietly and decently, as Jesus is said to hav directed, but were ostentatious to the extremest point, parading their petitions in the most public manner, with musical flourishes, exactly after the manner of a uniformed militia company. And when he was pronounced out of danger and became convalescent the churches resounded with praise and thanksgiving for his recovery. These modest saints—these bishops, deacons, ministers, and others—affected to believe that God had stayed the ravages of fever then consuming the noble and royal prince, and restored him to health, only in answer to their prayers.

But what are these guardians of the faith once delivered to the saints doing now? Months hav elapsed since the baccarat scandal, with all its nauseous details, has revealed to Great Britain and to the world the infamous fact that the prince of Wales is suffering from a fever worse than that which threatened his life several years ago—the gambling fever. Yet they are not setting apart days of fasting and prayer for the deliverance of the heir-apparent; they are not besieging the "throne of grace" that he may be cured of his gambling fever. Why not? Is not God able to do one thing as well as the other? Can God conquer typhoid, while baccarat defies his power? The saints are presumably not ready to admit this. Why, then, do they not act? While the English church is silent over this great danger to the beloved throne, a few of the dissenting bodies hav indeed raised their voices, but not in prayer. Oh, no! God does not seem to be equal to this emergency. They content themselvs with passing timid resolutions. They hope the prince will not be offended if they express the modest wish that he will not gamble any more. Think, they say—not of God and heaven—but of the feelings of the royal mother and the honor of the name of Guelph.

But why do they not pray? Is it because of the consciousness that, in the recent advance of intelligence among the people, public praying would be considered too much of a sham? If that is their conviction we will forgiv them for omitting their fasting days. If they will confess so much they may do the world more service than has yet crowned their labors.

And the circumstances in this case do indeed contain some signs of promis. Once the belief was universal in what has been called Christendom that in all periods of public peril—such, for instance, as plague and pestilence—the only help was to be found in humble petitions to God. No one dared to raise an objection to this superstition. Nor has this superstition entirely died away, as we see in the fact that the Catholic bishop of Colorado has ordered his priests to resort to prayers in Latin to exorcise the grasshoppers from the farmers' fields. But this is in the United States. But in England, before now, signs hav appeared to indicate that the old theological terrors hav lost some of their old force. One of these now occurs to us.

In 1853, when the cholera had broken out in various portions of Great Britain, the presbytery of Edinburgh, Scotland, sent a humble memorial to the English government. They wished to ask if it was contemplated to appoint, by royal authority, a day for fasting and prayer, to invoke almighty God to stay the ravages of cholera. They said, with great diffidence, that they had designed to appoint, by their own authority, such a day for Scotland; but they delayed doing so that they might first ascertain if the government of the realm designed to take similar action in the face of this great peril. The home secretary at that time happened to be Lord Palmerston—not the highest type of a man, but one who understood, better than anyone of his time, the average sentiment of the English people. He sent a reply to the presbytery in which he gave them no hope that the government would take the action they desired, but administered a little sound advice. He told them that in this emergency their only resource and hope was in sanitary reform. They must see that the dwellings of the poor were cleansed; they must clean out the cesspools, remove all pollution, and improve the drainage of the cities, or the epidemic of the cholera would spread fearfully, "in spite," he said, "of all the prayers of a united but inactiv nation."

It is instructiv to see in this incident the proof of the decay of superstition. The government official who would hav dared, two centuries earlier, even in England, to utter such "blasphemy" as that, could expect no other fate than to hav his head cut off.

Whether Palmerston's advice can hav any bearing on the emergency now appalling the people of England is another question. We fear that the art of moral sanitation is not yet discovered which can cleanse the cesspools of aristocratic vice. But the saints tacitly confess that prayer is useless.

A Roman Catholic Church Trick.

The Roman Catholics of Texas are working a promising scheme to capture the public schools in that state, and they hav the state officials drugged to a condition of acquiescence. About three weeks ago people were surprised to read in the San Antonio Express that of seventy-seven applicants at the Normal School for teachers' certificates forty-two were nuns—nineteen being "Sisters of the Incarnate Word," of the San Antonio convent, and twenty-two were "Sisters of the Divine Providence" from Castroville.

One reporter, remembering, as he put it, "the splendid organization of the church of Rome and its desire for spreading its empire in the hearts of the world," sought a bishop of the church to find out why the nuns were taking such interest in the public schools. Bishop Neraz, "devout, and fat, and kindly," received the reporter, and "was free to admit that it was a desire of the church to use their consecrated women in the public schools and that they were training them for it." "Our Sisters of Charity," he explained, "are being trained for many things. Some of them are trained to do the domestic work at the asylums and hospitals, some to do the needle-work, some to do the nursing; and now that the free schools are open for them to work in we are training them to teach. They are all chosen for the various departments according to their fitness, after study has been made of them by their superiors."

Sectarian instruction in the schools being strictly prohibited by the laws of Texas, as well as the payment of state money to sectarian institutions, doubts arose in the minds of many whether the nuns could be lawfully employed as teachers in the public schools. The Hon. H. C. Pritchett, state superintendent of public instruction, therefore applied to Attorney-General Culberson for an opinion. One of his assistants, Mr. Frank Andrews, furnishes the following:

"We hav given this matter careful attention and in reply thereto you are respectfully advised that the only qualifications required by law for a teacher in the public schools of this state, as the law now exists, are to be found in chapter 116, page 183, et sequa, acts twenty-second legislature. Section 2 of said act provides that anyone desiring to teach a public school shall present a certificate from three good citizens, known to the county superintendent or ex-officio superintendent, that the applicant is of good moral character and exemplary habits. The county superintendent shall thereupon, unless satisfied that some good cause exists for refusing the certificate hereinafter mentioned, recommend him to the board of examiners for examination.

"Section 3 provides that after such application and recommendation has been made, the board of examiners shall examin each applicant as to his competency to teach the branches named in the preceding clauses, in the English language, and shall make a report on oath to the county superintendent or ex-officio superintendent, which report shall state who of the board were present at such examination, that the applicant was examined in all the branches of study embraced in the grade of certificate recommended, and that such applicant is competent to teach and qualified to teach all such branches, and the county superintendent shall, if such report be favorable, issue a certificate of competency to the applicant, according to the grade recommended to the board of examiners, authorizing his employment by the trustees of any school district in the county in which the same is issued. These seem to be the only qualifications prescribed for teachers.

"The only question, therefore, is raised in the accompanying correspondence, submitted to your letter, as to whether or not a nun or sister of charity otherwise qualified would be prohibited from teaching in the public schools of this state on sectarian grounds. The constitution, Art. 8, Sec. 5, provides that no part of the permanent or available school fund of this state shall ever be appropriated to or used for the support of any sectarian school.

"Article 3,705, Sayles' Civil Statutes, provides that no part of the public school fund shall be appropriated to or used for the support of any sectarian school.

"The question resolves itself into whether or not the employment of a nun or sister of charity in a public free school to which the public free school money of the state has been apportioned would be an appropriation of any part of the school fund of this state for the support of a sectarian school.

"By the general law the trustees of the public schools of this state are given control and management of said schools under the direction of the county superintendent and under the direction of the state superintendent of public instruction, and it is the duty of these officers to see that the laws under which they act are properly enforced.

"If the trustees of any of the public schools of this state see fit to employ a nun or sister of charity to teach in such schools, and no religious teachings of any nature whatever are permitted during such school hours, nor in the school building, nor on the school premises, neither before or after school hours, I cannot see that the person so employed would be disqualified under the laws and constitution of this state.

"If, however, any nun or sister of charity, or any other person who should be employed by the trustees of any public school in this state to teach in said school, should in any manner whatever giv any religious instruction of any nature whatever, or in anywise teach or attempt to teach in any form, method, or manner the religion of any denomination, sect, or creed, such a teacher could not be paid out of the public school fund of this state, as it would be in violation of the constitution to appropriate any part of the school fund to the support of any sectarian school or school where any kind of religion was taught.

"You are therefore respectfully advised that in the opinion of this department you hav no authority to withhold a certificate, authorizing her to teach in the public schools of the state, from a nun or sister of charity upon the exclusiv ground that she is a member of a religious order or maintains and upholds a particular religious faith.

"The spirit of our institutions is that religious faith or want of religious faith should not prevent the citizens of this country from exercising and enjoying all the rights, immunities, and privileges granted under the constitution and laws of this state and it is only when the constitution and laws prohibiting religious instruction in our public free schools are infringed that you would be authorized to withhold payment of teachers' vouchers.

"The employment of a nun or sister of charity is a matter peculiarly under the supervision of the trustees of each public school and superintendent or county judge, as the case may be, of each county, and if the proper officer should be satisfied that some good cause existed for refusing a certificate to a nun or sister of charity he would be authorized to refuse to issue the same as in any other case, but it is not believed that he could legally refuse to grant the certificate upon the exclusiv ground that the applicant was a nun or sister of charity, but he would be authorized to refuse payment of any voucher where any sort of religion was taught in any public school in his county as above indicated.

"Our Bill of Rights also provides, Art. 1, Sec. 4, that 'No religious test shall ever be required as a qualification to any office or public trust in this state.'

"Sec. 6 of the same article provides that 'No human authority ought in any case whatever to control or interfere with the rights of conscience in matters of religion, and no preference shall be given by law to any religious society or mode of worship.'

"It is, therefore, concluded, as above indicated, that you can make no distinction against any person on account of any religious belief he may hav or any religion to which he may belong or maintain; provided always that no religious teaching of any nature by any person is permitted in the public schools of this state."

The question now turns on what is sectarian instruction. If we pass over the fact that the nuns will giv their wages to the church and thus evade the law forbidding state money to be used for sectarian purposes (as if the nuns really earn the money they hav a right to giv it to whom they please), can we pass over the fact that nuns are the very symbol of sectarianism and teach, by their presence, one of the tenets of Romanism? When they go into the schools their very garb is silently inculcating the faith of their church, and can anyone, not a natural-born fool, suppose that these women will not find other subtle ways to prejudice the minds of the children in favor of the Romish church? Sectarianism consists of other things besides creeds and sermons and printed forms.

The move is a shrewd one on the part of Rome, and it is a pity that the state officers are so willing to aid it. They are helping the worst enemy the public schools hav to fasten its tentacles and spread its poisonous influence in the most vital support of our republican form of government. The Catholic church will let the nuns teach in the schools only that she may control and finally destroy them. She has not, for several years, thought it worth while to conceal her enmity to our system of education, and her attacks upon the schools, whether indirect, as in this case, or direct, as in the cases of the schools in Western cities closed by a vote of the Catholic population, are now in open and acknowledged warfare upon them.

There is, however, one or two ways to defeat the scheme. Superintendents and trustees of schools can refuse to employ them. But if they are employed, parents can watch their doings and hav them ousted for teaching their superstition.

Editorial Notes.

We learn from the London Freethinker that Mr. Charles Watts will join the National Secular Society of England, with which he hopes to work loyally, and at the next Conference will doubtless be elected a vice-president.

The Christian Advocate thus describes a part of the personnel of the Salvation Army: "Some of the worst characters of both sexes, too, hav joined the Army to carry out schemes of iniquity, or to get the support which comes to conspicuous workers in such a cause. From time to time they hav been brought before the courts, imprisoned, and even executed." The Voice, which is also a pious paper, adds: "Whether Dr. Buckley's charge is true or not of the Salvation Army, it is absolutely true of the Methodist church, and we might add of every other church. Was not even Judas Iscariot one of the twelve?"

The Sun makes a fuss over Sam Jones, the Georgia cracker's, blasphemy, quoting this to prove its assertion: "God takes his auger and bores right down through a fellow's head to his heart and into his pocket, which should spurt like an artesian well. He don't begin way down and bore up. If he did, what would he do with the dirt? He can't do much with a fool, though, and there are some pieces of hickory that the Lord could not make an ax helv out of to save his soul." Well, what of it? Hasn't he a right to say that? Sam Jones is an uneducated, unread, wide-mouthed blatherskite, but even a fool has a right to blaspheme if he chooses.

Asbury Park is undergoing its regular summer camp-meeting fever. Three or four sessions are held each day, but it is in the evening, says a report, that the religious paroxysms reach their highest point. Then it is that the frenzy is greatest, the shouting and groaning the loudest, and the experience referred to by the camp-meeting people as "getting religion" the most frequent. This is a hint to the psychologist. Evening is the time chosen for most dissipations of a vicious nature, and the kinship of these to religion and the identity of the emotions provoking them may well be studied by those who would explain the seemingly inexplicable conduct of some human beings.

The following is from a daily newspaper printed in this city: "Policeman Whately, of the Madison street station, entered the notion store of Salamon Jacobs, at No. 35 Division street, Sunday last, and asked for a five-cent piece of ribbon. 'My little girl,' said the policeman, 'is going to church and wants the ribbon to tie up her hair.' The storekeeper obliged him, and to his astonishment he was made a prisoner for violation of the Sabbath law. He was arraigned in the Essex Market police court yesterday, where the storekeeper told the above story and the policeman made no denial. 'I don't like to see a policeman make such mean arrests,' said Justice Ryan as he discharged the defendant.' If the people of New York like that sort of thing, let them hav it. When the public is aroused, however, Sunday laws will go.

The Chinese emperor has ordered his three or four hundred million subjects to let Christian missionaries and converts alone, saying: "The doctrin of Christianity has for its purpose the teaching of men to be good." Without explaining the emperor's error, the Sun remarks: "The imperial decree, which has by this time been promulgated over China, must giv the Chinese people a new and amazing idea concerning the nature and purpose of Christianity." The Evening Sun, which seems to exist for the purpose of saying things its morning edition does not dare to, adds: "It is also the case, that such a decree must giv the Christian peoples a new and amazing idea concerning the results in the way of toleration and fair-mindedness that follow the teachings of Confucius. When a president of the United States, eager to secure fair treatment for the Chinese, shall point out in a proclamation that the doctrin of Confucius has for its purpose the teaching of men to respect each other's rights to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, we shall be able to say, with proof, that our religion is as good a working one as that which inspires the proclamation of the emperor of China. When we remember that it was old Confucius who invented the Golden Rule that we brag about, saying to his followers: 'Do not unto others what you would not hav them do to you,' thereby wisely asking as much as he could reasonably expect of Chinamen, it is difficult to understand what our blessed missionaries are meddling with in China, anyhow, and why they can't let the Chinese run along on a moral basis so much better suited to their style than anything we hav to offer?"

Letters from Friends.

May Fortune Attend You.

JACKSONVILLE, FLA., Aug. 3, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: We are about to organize a Freethinker's club, for mutual benefit in conversation and debate, here in Jacksonville. We will giv you information as we proceed.

Respectfully yours, J. DOUGLAS.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed I send you Wells, Fargo & Co.'s money order. I hav a good many unsold copies, but may hav a chance to sell them within say six months or so. Your paper is first-class and Watson Heston's illustrations tell us a great deal. Respectfully yours, S. D. SCHOENFELD.

That Constitution Neither Liberal nor Economical.

PINEVILLE, KY., Aug. 8, 291.

MR. EDITOR: The new constitution was carried by about seventy thousand votes. There are some good things in it, but I do not think it is any improvement on the old one. It cost the state about $200,000. It is said that the litigation it will cause will not end in thirty years. That is generally the outcome of law-making. It's good for the lawyers. Long liv THE TRUTH SEEKER and its Editor. S. P. HERRON.

What Is to be Done about Such Cases?

WASHINGTONVILLE, O., Aug. 5, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Please stop my paper, for I cannot pay for it. It is the best Liberal paper I read, and I am very sorry to say stop it. I am sixty-five years old, and I am the only support of the family. I am sick and not very able to work. I am a miner. I hav worked fifty-seven years in the mines. I started to work in the mines when I was eight years old, and now I am about worn out. From your brother,

JAMES YATES.

A Noble Sentiment from a Venerable Man.

DAYTON, O., Aug. 10, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I am now within a few days of being in my eighty-second year, and do not expect to hav the pleasure of renewing my subscription to the interesting and instructiv old TRUTH SEEKER many years more. Let that be as it may, my greatest wish is that the great principles of Freethought may continue to prosper, until by the survival of the fittest man will be mentally advanced to a degree that will enable him to liv by reason and not by fear.

Truly yours, J. A. WALTERS.

Every Town Should Do Likewise.

GUTHRIE, OK. TERR., Aug. 3, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: The Spiritualists and Freethinkers of this city, having arranged a Sunday-school and lyceum, do solicit of Liberals books, papers, hymn-books—in fact, everything pertaining to the advancement and instruction of a school and lyceum of this organization. There are but few members, and they are financially poor. However, we hav organized with a full determination of working faithfully for the success and building up of a grand institution in Guthrie, where there is a large field for work, hence solicit and will most thankfully receive all assistance that our brothers and sisters in unison will so kindly send to us. We need Sunday-school books, papers, hymn-books, money—in fact, everything which it requires for the building up of an organization of this nature.

MRS. G. W. TOWNSEND, Sec.

Wise Words.

ROME, GA., Aug. 9, E.M. 291.

MR. EDITOR: Continue to strike sledge-hammer blows at the churches and superstition. I like to read contributions from John Peck and Otto Wettstein, and last, but not least, Col. Robert G. Ingersoll.

I hav forty or fifty back numbers of THE TRUTH SEEKER on hand. If any reader thinks he or she can do any good with them, and will send me their address, I will mail them at once.

I am sorry to see some Liberals quarreling with each other about their different isms. I think they should all organize in one solid body, and help the American Secular Union in its fight for state Secularization, and when that is accomplished, they can quarrel over their isms afterward. Let us hav harmony in the ranks. With the best of wishes for THE TRUTH SEEKER and Heston, I remain,

Yours for Freethought, AUGUSTUS L. HANSON.

Truly the Mendacity Should be Exposed.

PITTSBURGH, PA., Aug. 5, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: By this mail I send you a copy of the Youth's Evangelist, a paper published in Pittsburgh and given out to all the Sunday-school children in the Presbyterian churches in western Pennsylvania on Sunday, August 2d. A child came home from church and handed a copy to me, at the house of a friend where I was visiting, and having marked some of the gross falsehoods therein I send it to you. I was astonished to find that Christian people were teaching such great lies to the children of the country. Such mendacious conduct ought to be exposed in THE TRUTH SEEKER, for which purpose I send you the paper. Freethought Sunday-schools ought to be generally established in order to teach children the elementary principles of science and the truths of history, and also to think for themselvs, instead of being deceived and imposed upon by religious teachers in church Sunday-schools. Yours in favor of truth,

CRATARGUS.

The Holy Coat.

DIXIE, TEX., Aug. 6, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Matters out here are yet gloriously holy. Still, if every Freethinker had the courage to come out openly we would muster about fifteen good ones. Dull times in this county hav prevented me from getting more subscribers. We will hav some fun, I guess, about the heiligen Rock in Trier (the holy coat in Treves). I hope Mr. Heston will pay due respects and veneration to it. What a pretty picture it would be if an instantaneous photograph could be obtained when the whole congregation and the priests are in the church, some admiring, others exhibiting, the celebrated humbug. As I was still in Germany at the last exhibition of the humbug I recollect very well the excitement that arose, even coming near causing a split in the Roman Catholic church. We do not know yet what the present exhibition will bring forward. Sensible people will make as great a demonstration against it as imperial laws and press constraint will permit. Yours truly, A. TURPE.

A Change of "In God We Trust."

KEOTA, IA., July 31, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I am sorry to learn that in leveling the mountains of ignorance whereon the churches are built, you work with a financial deficiency. I rally with two little "In Humanity We Trust's" for pictures and cause, and hope that all your readers will bring their nickel. To me, an old solid Materialist, the management of THE TRUTH SEEKER is perfect; but any light will drive the bats from their seclusion. Astronomy, geology, psychology, physics, paleontology, history, ancient and modern, from Zoroaster to Zeno and from Plato to Ingersoll, work as lightning or dynamite to destroy the pillars of ignorance and superstition, by the mind of "our Editor" and THE TRUTH SEEKER contributors. A hearty shake with the next neighbor. The Spiritist is, although welcome and in order, generally, as you truly said, useless.

Rather hastily, with the hayseeds flying,

Yours truly, CHARLES NAUMAN.

Contradicts Other Informants.

ROCHESTER, MINN., Aug. 12, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I am surprised on reading the last TRUTH SEEKER at what you say of the case of Mr. Swartz. Is not THE TRUTH SEEKER a little bigoted on some subjects, as well as our orthodox brethren? For a description of the Kansas City Sunday Sun you take the statement of one of the "injured" Missouri senators. You might as well take the statement of the "injured" Rev. Mr. Braden in regard to what he thinks of THE TRUTH SEEKER. You say, "The paper only prints names when it attacks the weak and defenseless." Is that the reason the poor, meek, and defenseless senators and representativs of Missouri had to enact laws to "down the paper" to protect themselvs in their midnight carousals? Would it not be a good thing if we had many more of such "vile sheets" to show up and expose the wickedness and cussedness in high as well as in low life? If these pure law-makers and others hav been slandered so when on their drunks, why do they not prosecute the paper that has "lied" so about them and stop their whining?

The Diet Question.

WHEELING, W. VA., July 30, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I saw a statement the other day to the effect that vegetarianism is the solution of the temperance question, and that when men quit eating meat they will cease drinking alcoholic stuffs. As the diet question is an important one in more ways than one, it might receive a little discussion now and then through the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER. The nations that eat the most meat also drink the most liquor, and I suppose they drink the most liquor because they eat the most meat. I hav no doubt there are other causes for the drinking habit, but I do not believe there are any equal to a meat diet. Not only has meat to do with intemperance, but it has also much to do with causing human selfishness. It feeds the grasping, getting spirit in man. One of the most mild and unselfish men I ever met was one who subsisted on what he called the "Edenic" diet, a diet of uncooked food, consisting of fruit, grains, nuts, and vegetables. I think it safe to say that the less meat we eat the better it will be for health and morals, as well as for the cause of temperance. C. BURSER.

"Muscular Wonders" Explained.

MILES CITY, MONT., Aug. 12, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: As the writer of the letter in THE TRUTH SEEKER of August 1st would like to hav "the problem solved" with reference to the Georgia wonder, I send the following, clipped from the Minneapolis Journal, which may throw some light on the subject and be of interest to the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER. C. E. WEBST.

ABERDEEN, S. D., August 10.—Annie Abbott, the "Georgia Magnet," who has been giving exhibitions of her wonderful powers in all the leading towns and cities of the Dakotas, was "exposed" by W. P. Butler and others at the opera house Saturday evening. The management expected something of the kind and were careful what they presented. Some of the local committee were skeptical as to her powers and at the close of the entertainment Mr. Butler, amid great excitement, jumped on the stage and denounced the whole thing as a "fake." He claimed that all of her feats were but the result of mechanical laws skillfully applied by a woman who was a trained athlete, and proceeded to perform some of her feats which he did with ease. At the close of Butler's "show" a vote was taken, the audience affirming the "Georgia Magnet" a "fake." The affair created much interest.

Many Atheist Mothers.

FISHKILL-ON-HUDSON, N. Y., July 29, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I am receiving so many excellent letters from Atheist women in response to my call for them on behalf of my California friend that I feel a desire to publicly congratulate Liberals at large on the number of intelligent, broad-minded women we hav in our ranks. Every one of these letters would be well worth printing in THE TRUTH SEEKER. It is a genuin treat to Mr. K., as well as myself, to read the responses that are pouring in. It is good for us to thus exchange sentiments and opinions, and to encourage one another in the good work of Liberalizing and happifying humankind. The mother molds the race, and very, very glad am I to find so many Atheist mothers, and hope the white-winged messages will keep on coming

Religion Only Old Wives' Tales.

CARTHAGE, MISS., July 23, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I am very much pleased with THE TRUTH SEEKER, and want the pictures right along. Our path is thorny, but our work and aim is glorious. The Augean stable is hard to clean—harder here than in the land of my birth, Protestant Germany, thanks to evening-meetings in the German village where old and young women met to spin flax, children and younger folks of both sexes freely admitted. There the old women related the most astonishing ghost stories, which frightened us children awfully Getting older, we were instructed and convinced that all these ghost stories were the outgrowth of the brains of these old women and lacked all reality. That was good, and eradicated all and any inclination to believe in ghosts. Here the people did not go through such an interesting course of early training, and so if they do free themselvs from superstition in the church they fall into the superstition of the ghosts, or Spiritology. They come from the Scylla into the Charybdis. Let them attend the meetings of flax-spinning women in some remote German village (for they hav these spinn-stuben only in very remote places now), let them listen to these old women attentivly, and that will rid them of their ghost superstition, while arguments and reason are useless. AN OLD FREETHINKER, STRAIGHT.

The Holy Harlequin.

DENVER, COL., Aug. 13, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: The Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, the great Brooklyn fakir, is making a tour of the wild and woolly West. He is managed, advertised, and boomed after the fashion of a circus, a menagerie, or one of the monstrosities of the side-shows. He is on exhibition as a theological curiosity left over from a past age. He is traveling for money. No money, no lecture. Several times he has refused to lecture unless he was guaranteed a stipulated sum in cash. Recently he spoke at the charming mountain resort of Green Mountain Falls and several hundred people went up from Denver to hear how to be saved and be told how heaven is run. Seats had been provided around the pavilion from which the great pulpiteer spoke, and hundreds of shining quarters were dropped into the coffers of the management for permission to sit in the rain and listen to the sermon. An additional fee of twenty-five cents was charged for the privilege of being sheltered by the pavilion. Many who paid $2.50 for transportation were loud in their protests against having to pay an additional fee to hear a very poor sermon. But the celebrated preacher is a Christian for revenue only and demanded the "uttermost farthing" that could by any scheme be obtained. However, we should not complain, for he succeeded in making many converts, not to his religion, but to Freethought. De Witt Talmage is the harlequin of the pulpit.

FRANKLIN C. JOHNSON.

We Thought We Were Doing Right.

BABYLON, N. Y., Aug. 15, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Ingersoll says:

Through the dim long years that hav fled, humanity has suffered more than can be conceived. Most of the misery has been endured by the weak, the loving, and the innocent. Women hav been treated like poisonous beasts, and little children trampled upon as though they had been vermin. Numberless altars hav been reddened, even with the blood of babes; beautiful girls hav been given to slimy serpents, whole races of men doomed to centuries of slavery, and everywhere there has been outrage beyond the power of genius to express. During all these years the suffering hav supplicated; the withered lips of famin hav prayed; the pale victims hav implored, and heaven has been deaf and blind.

And now, MR. TRUTH SEEKER, I would ask, What hav you done for these long years you hav been printing and preaching long-winded sermons? Hav you advised any means whereto some of the above sufferers might look with hope and security on a rainy day for a harbor of peace? This telling mankind simply, "You are imposed upon," is not sufficient. You or some one else must take steps to provide a home for those who think with us and are unable to stem the tide of Christian opinion. Our doctors and lawyers who are grabbing money by the handful may not feel the sting of the lash raised by the followers of the meek man of the woods.

P. H. FOSTER.

An Outargued Priest.

WANSAQUET, R. I., Aug. 9, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: We used to hav a Baptist church here standing on Main street, right in the way of business. Well, the Providence Clothing Company bought them out, and the old church is now turned into a railroad warehouse, and we hav a very fine business block in place of it. Well, I happened to drop into a store a short time ago, where I met four of my friends who are Freethinkers, and they were in a discussion about the signs of the times with a priest, and they finally drove me into the ring, and in the course of our chat I happened to mention Colonel Ingersoll's name, when the priest flew mad in a second, and among the rest he said: "He tears down all the time, but he don't giv you anything in the place of it." "Well," said I, "suppose you had a cancer on your face, which was eating your face all up, and I came along and cured it, would you ask me what I was going to giv you in place of it?" "Well," said he, "you would leave a big hole there." "Even so," said I, "it would be better than to hav it eat your whole face up. But," said I, "allow me to draw your attention to this new building now in course of construction on Main street; that is going to be a fine building, is it not?" "Yes," said he. "Well," said I, "before they could put up that building they had to remove a rotten old church, congregation and all, and dig down some ten feet or more before they could lay a good foundation for that building, and that is just what Colonel Ingersoll is doing now. He is clearing away the old rubbish, and he is doing it very effectually, and if he does not liv long enough to build on the site, some one who will come after him will go on with the improvements." Just then he had business out of doors, and we had a good laugh together. Straws show which way the wind blows. Long liv THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Money and Railroads.

FOND DU LAC, WIS., Aug. 11, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I send three renewals and two new subscribers. I hope your correspondents are satisfied with their discussions of the silver dollar. I would like to say that perhaps our nation cannot change its coinage acts much without producing more or less injury or benefit. It certainly was disastrous to this country in 1873 when John Sherman voted to take away the old silver dollar and take the trade dollars, though he has said he didn't know it. The Irishman stood hanging with the rope under his arms for several hours, yet when he put it round his neck he denied the charge; and Sherman, as chairman of the finance committee from 1867, tried to do the same thing with the silver dollar every year, and, being a little foxy, let others help him. Now, what would be the result if the government should issue greenbacks sufficient to pay its debt at the rate of $25,000,000 per month and make the money a full legal tender for all debts, public and private (that is all the force money can be made to hav), and let the gold and silver be made into bars—all of it free, to be used at home or sent abroad when wanted as pure metal, and then in a few years begin to melt our coins above fifty-cent pieces into bars and make their money at the same rate per month? When would the circulation amount to $75 per capita? Then these men who want a redeemer like the Christian's must wait till they are conditioned for it. Then in line with such policy I would by law establish one per cent interest, and one cent a mile for railroad fare and three mills per ton per mile freight. And amend John Sherman's anti-trust law, and make them void when the capital exceeds $50,000; and make all combines of trust companies void, and the capital to escheat to the state, and the state pay half of such capital to the informer.

A Scheme for Consideration.

BLOOMDALE, O., Aug. 11, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: While the Prohibitionists talk about legislating away the use of liquor, which, of course, everyone knows will prove futil, a few ideas occurred to me which I thought may not be out of place if they appear among the correspondence in our old friend THE TRUTH SEEKER. Since the government has given the liquor-vendors a license and derives a formidable revenue, let them (the vendors) alone, but go for the habitual and professional drunkards or bibbers, and somewhat after this fashion: Take away their voting privileges, i. e., disfranchise them completely; and if they persist deny them further the privilege of testifying in court under oath or any other form of giving evidence. My humble opinion is that if they hav anything left in them that may be termed dignity this procedure would put them on it and touch them in the sorest places to awaken them to a sense of their duty to themselvs and the community at large. And then would follow these consequences—the old topers would decrease and die out, the rising generation would learn to view this low practice with aversion, the saloons would find theirs an unprofitable business, or be patronized by the traveling public only, or die a natural death for want of patronage. Now I would strike a blow at a few others, and they are the following—the gamblers, the habitual loafers, confidence men, thieves, blacklegs, criminals, and hard cases of all kinds. Take away their franchises and testifying privilege at court, and generally make them equal to ciphers in this great nation, and if necessary compel them to wear a badge describing the grade of their uselessness. And again it is my opinion that if anything in the world would tend to put a person on his dignity this would. Children could then see the brand of disgrace that the government or the people put on these failings and soon learn to avoid them. As things are at present there is no cessation of the evil and no good example to the young.

It may be said that some of the old topers would go on drinking, thoroughly indifferent about voting, etc. My answer is, make all these break stones for macadamizing the country pikes and improving the condition of them, and thereby reduce taxation.

The Flood Myth Exploded.

ST. LOUIS, MO., July 19, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Being a constant reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and desiring to help along the good cause of truth as against the dark superstition that still has such a hold on our civilization, I inclose a communication I made to the St. Louis Republic, a paper usually fair on all subjects except religion. In this it is very unfair. Other people, notably Freethinkers and Spiritualists, complain of this. Every Sunday whole columns of nonsense from a "Clergyman" appear in it, but truths substantiated by such overwhelming evidence as is offered in the above communication are ignored. But most of the so-called non-sectarian press are equally partial on religio-philosophical subjects, suppressing truths supported by the best evidence and giving wide circulation to glaring falsehoods, legends, and superstitions. The Republic in replying to a communication, during its free tour contest, which questioned its count, scorned other than a free ballot and fair count, but it published hundreds of letters about religious legends, legendary persons, advocates of creeds supported by only myths many times exploded by science, but not one letter calling attention to well-authenticated facts where these facts opposed creeds and their falsehoods. Hence it is badly deficient in a free ballot and fair count.

What is this, anyway, that muzzles the press, chains Freethought, boycotts society, and ostracises its opponents, and hoods scientific facts, at the same time circulating the mythologies of barbarous ages? Nor does it pause here. It grasps at the state, goes into the legislativ halls, infringes on the rights, liberties, and property of other people, continuously laboring to carry the horrors of the medieval into the present age. The flood myth is only one of many which cannot withstand the light of scientific investigation. In fact, nearly all the biblical tales are vulnerable. It is the duty of Liberals, Spiritualists, scientists, and all who believe in unfettered truths, to come out boldly and assist in downing this relic of barbarism. Science demands it, humanity demands it, for history shows that the farther we remove from such barbarous institutes, the human race becomes happier, freer, and better.

T. W. COOPER.

ST. LOUIS, MO., June 14, 1891.

Editor of the Republic: I inclose one vote for R. G. Ingersoll. Of the fifty leading competitors in your lists for the Bible journey, with the possible exception of Sheldon and Cave, all are held in strong bonds to preach their respectiv creeds, and dare not express other opinions, so they are disqualified from the critical examination of such an eminent scientific and historical tour, in which your readers are so much interested. I will giv one instance. All these creeds assert as facts that about 2100 to 2200 B.C. there was a deluge covering the highest mountains with water. They giv a definit genealogy from the birth of Arphaxad, two years after the flood, of eleven patriarchs to Jacob, embracing a time of 432 years, or to the beginning of a semi-authentic history. They demand these ministers to accept and preach this legend as infallible. They are paid to do it. They are abused, vilified, ostracised, and deprived of their standing and position, if they do not advocate it just as their creeds record it. The head of Professor Briggs, dripping with recent gore, dangles over the gate through which they depart. His Union Seminary is boycotted, as per your clergyman's "Sunday Thoughts" of to-day. Now, in the very arena of this flood district the greatest elevation of the plains of Mesopotamia is 700 feet, of Mt. Lebanon 10,000 feet, of the Taurus range 8,000 to 12,000 feet, and Mt. Ararat, where the legend had the ark to rest, 17,000 feet. Your minister can measure these elevations. Then he ascends the Nile valley. Here he finds monumental history, written on imperishable stone walls, pilasters, and columns, engraved from pedestal to terminals, on base, shaft, frieze, and abacus. He can read inscriptions in their tombs and mausoleums from architrave to floor molding. There we find an abundance of authentic history of thirty dynasties, embracing a time, as per Professor Lipsius of 3,900 years, per Manetto 5,004 years, B.C. The thirteenth to sixteenth dynasties were contemporaneous with the eleven legendary patriarchs back to the flood. Your minister thus meets with a direct contradiction of this book of Genesis and the teachings of his creed, backed by the most overwhelming monumental evidence, for the thirteen dynasties contained two thousand years or more. Coexisting with the first dynasty was a high civilization, which could hav been attained only by several thousand years of human effort. No monumental evidence of this flood has been discovered in Egypt, although search for it has been made by most Egyptologists. Now, should one of your learned ministers, searching through monuments, papyri, sarcophagi, and mummies, discover and be convinced that there was no flood in Egypt, whose level was but a little above the sea and thousands of feet below levels flooded, as written in his creed, only a few hundred miles away, at the time, nor for thousands of years previous, can he hav the courage to face his church and community and tell the truth, which would end his ministerial career? I doubt it. Yet three out of four of your readers desire to know the truth.

Ingersoll is not so handicapped, and I think would giv his unbiased opinion on this and other truths he would discover.

Yours, T. W. COOPER.

Romanism Soundly Belabored.

NEWARK, N. J., July 31, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Our Constitution declares all men are born free and equal, and the right to liberty is universal and inalienable, and the United States shall guarantee to every state a republican form of government. Now, where is there any liberty in our country if the Mother of Harlots and the father of lies is allowed to immure our children in prisons called nunneries, there to liv a wretched life, and mothers and fathers are allowed to see or talk to their dear ones only through prison bars? O'a, what a great wrong is permitted to be done under the name of religion and liberty! Those demented creatures are led to their prison cells as the negro slaves were led by their owners to prison-pens seven and twenty years ago, or like the oxen to their slaughter. That those nuns are slaves to the beast is unquestionable. They pray to God, and to virgins who were mothers to children and saints who were their fathers. In fact, they pray to devils, and should be called devil-worshipers. The inhumanity of the church has made many Infidels. As long as it continues to build nunneries there will be thousands to detest the church of Rome. Caste in the Protestant churches has done them a great injury and has been the cause of large numbers leaving and deserting.

A few years ago I went to Albany, N. Y., passing by a large Catholic cathedral back of the capitol on the hill. The doors of the church were wide open, and inside of the church was a small congregation, and the priestly wolf was dressed in his regimentals. He was celebrating high requiem to catch and locate the dead man's soul. It was the bishop's church. I was looking up to the ceiling of the church. I was admiring the decorations of the interior. The people saw me looking at the ceiling and thought I was looking for the man's soul taking its flight. Immediately the mourners looked upward, and as I had been the means of diverting their minds from the mass I arose and left the church, and looking up to view the architecture outside I read this notice, "A single sitting at mass, ten cents." "What?" I exclaimed, "can it be possible that those pagans will insult the honest poor? That it will cost ten cents to go into the house of God—before they are allowed to go in to commune with God?" The hackmen answered me, "The church must be supported." "Oh, yes, by such people as you, who will allow yourselvs to be insulted and to be made slaves of to build such splendid churches. You are told after building your own house for a pauper, it will cost ten cents to enter. If you were men, you would tear such disgraceful signs from your church doors." And a few of them said, "Bully for you, old man!" And others said it was none of my "damned business." I answered, "It is every man's business to liberate slaves, and point out frauds who under the cloak of religion are impoverishing the country and robbing the people. Look at that priest inside there who is chanting a prayer to God—it takes money to induce that priest to plead to God to forgiv that man his sins! By that man's death the priest gets his fee, but can any one of you get the verdict whether your God permitted that soul to enter the sanctum sanctorum? Now, if you folks would employ a lawyer to plead for a thief or a murderer you would always get the verdict. A lawyer pleads to a judge to get a thief or a murderer clear from his just punishment that he richly deserves, and the priest for a miserable, cowardly wretch that deserved to be punished. The lawyer is the more honest of the two. And I would not like to be engaged in either of their vocations, for culprits should be punished." There was a dead silence in that crowd as I told them to think for themselvs instead of hiring others to think for them, and if they would keep away from their churches one month those signs would be removed, and if they wished to kill the devil they could starve him to death if they did not feed him. So I bid them good-bye and passed on. Before leaving Albany it was my good fortune to meet one of those hackmen, who congratulated me on making a convert. He was a man of a family of six children, and was glad that I had laid the truth before him. He said he did not sleep the whole night thinking of my words, and he resolved that he would never again be led by the priest, for it was nothing but paying out money to support the church. And I hav no doubt that man kept his word. Now, if those politicians of both of the political parties would speak out as plainly as I do there would be very few nunneries built where only the priestly wolves are allowed to enter. Those brothels and sinks of iniquity will be allowed to exist as long as those two parties hold out, for neither of the sets of bosses dare open their filthy mouths and say one word against those bawdy-house prisons. Americans! where is your manhood? Where is the chivalry and courage of your fathers? Your love of country has departed, and you are politically corrupt and you think a political office is the only thing worth living for. You will get down in the mud, and eat it too, to curry favor with popish bosses to get an office. Shame you hav none!

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for his Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

A Boy Hero.

In harmless Paris, which to foreign eyes
Seems made of mirrors, gaslight, and display,
A splendid building's walls began to rise,
Ascending stone by stone from day to day.

High and more high the pile was builded well,
And scores of laborers were busy there,
When suddenly a fragil staging fell,
And two strong workmen swung aloft in air,

Suspended by their hands to one slight hold,
That bent and cracked beneath their sudden weight,
One worn with toil and growing gray and old;
One a mere boy, just reaching man's estate,

Yet with a hero's soul. Alone and young,
Were it not well to yield his single life,
On which no parent leaned, no children clung,
And save the other to his babes and wife?

He saw that ere deliverance could be brought
The frail support they grasped must surely break,
And in that shuddering moment's flash of thought
He chose to perish for his comrade's sake.

With bravery such as heroes seldom know,
"'Tis right," he said, and loosing his strong grip
Dropped like a stone upon the stones below,
And lay there dead, the smile still on his lip.

What though no laurels grow his grave above,
And o'er his name no sculptured shaft may rise?
To the sweet spirit of unselfish love
Was not his life a glorious sacrifice?

ELIZABETH AKERS.

What the Little Folks are Saying.

Jimmy Warburton is the grandson of the proprietor of Cressbrook greenhouses, and he is a little more than four years old. He is just wearing pants and jacket for the first time. Little Edie, his playmate, a dark-eyed, bright child, wants jacket and pants also. She and Jimmy play together a great deal. The other day Jimmy did a naughty act that might hav resulted seriously. He went into the house and told his mamma that the men who were working in the trench near by would like some matches. As there were several men at work his mamma thought a card of matches none too many, and handed the same to Jimmy, who gravely took the matches and marched off. Presently Jimmy came back quite a sight to behold with a smoky face and a rather dilapidated appearance generally.

After some talk it came out that Jimmy, with the strategy of an older head, had obtained the matches for another purpose. With them he and Edie had built a fire in Hon. Milton Read's lot near by. The result was that Edie had a scorched toe and Jimmy had become pretty well smoked up.

He would not own that he had told a wrong story in getting the matches under false pretenses, but said that he had made a mistake. In impressing upon his mind the danger of his act, in order to prevent a repetition of the same, his mamma told him he had trespassed upon another person's property, and there was no knowing what might happen had Mr. Reed been at home. Jimmy might hav been taken to the station house in the vehicle known as the "hurry-up."

Bracing himself up with much dignity, the little fellow said: "What? Milton Reed arrest me? He can't do it! I'm my grandfather's boy. My grandfather would blacken Reed's eye if he should attempt to arrest me. No, sir; Milton Reed can't arrest me!"
